A1   The Wise Snake

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) I am Yuwəl Yuḥanna ʾIsḥaq of the village of Dure, from Barwar. (The story) goes (like this), it is (as follows):[1]
(2) There was a king. This king had a dream. In the morning he said '(If there is) any person who knows what I have seen in my dream, I shall give him a hundred gold coins. That is, (if there is) anybody who knows what this king spoke, what he saw in his dream, he will give him a hundred gold coins. (3) People began to go to the king. One says 'You have seen such-and-such', another 'You have seen such-and-such' and another 'You have seen such-and-such'. (4) One man says to his wife 'I shall go. I also shall try my luck. Let's see (whether) I am lucky.[2] Perhaps I shall win. He set off and walked for a time,[3] then on the road a snake crossed his path. (5) The snake said 'Hey, man, where are you going?' He said 'By God, I am going to the king. The king has had a dream and says that anybody who knows what he saw in his dream and tells him will have a thousand gold pieces. So, I also want to go and tell him something. Perhaps "the stone has hit the walnut, and the walnut has fallen on the ground". Perhaps I have won.' (6) The snake said to him 'If I tell you what the king saw in his dream, will you divide those thousand gold pieces, half for me and half for you?' He said 'Man! A hundred is enough for me. All the rest will be for you'. It said 'No! Half for me and half for you'. He said 'I promise'. It said 'Say to the king "You saw in your dream that that it was raining foxes"'.

(7) So, he went. His turn came and he entered into the presence of the king. He (the king) said 'Well, let's see whether you can tell me what I saw in my dream.' He said 'Yes, king.' He said 'You saw in your dream that it was raining foxes.' He (the king) said 'Ah! How did you know?!' He gives him a thousand gold coins. A thousand gold coins (were given to him) and he went. (8) He went out on the road and thought. He said 'What will the snake do with the thousand gold coins that I should go and give them to it?! I shall not give it a penny. I'll go home, pay back my debts and look after my children, look after myself. Let the snake go to its place.' (9) He went (on his way). He went home. He did not give (the money) and that was that. A month later the king had another dream. He dreamt again. He said '(if there is) anybody who knows what happened in it,[4] I shall give him another thousand gold coins. (10) He heard (and said) 'Oh dear. I have wrecked (my relationship) with the snake. How can it be (that it will help me).' He said to his wife. 'I have done such-and-such. What do you say?' She said 'Go and ask forgiveness from it. Say "I shall give you your money"'. He said 'I shall go. Let's see, perhaps it will not be there, perhaps it will go out onto the road to meet me.'[5] (11) He set off, again the snake came out before him. 'Hey so-and-so, where are you going?' He said 'By God, peace be upon you. I am very sorry. You know, by your soul, I was in trouble. I was in debt. I took that money and paid off my debts. I have sorted myself out now. Forgive me please.'[6] (12) It said 'Now where are you going?' He said 'The king has had a dream again. He will give a thousand gold pieces to anyone who tells him what his dream is.' It said 'This time, if I tell you, will you really divide them in half?' (13) He said 'Man, how (could it be that) I shall not divide them?' This time everything is for you, if you want, in place of those (other coins).' It said 'No! Half for me and half for you'. It said 'You should say "The king has seen in his dream that it was raining wolves"'. (14) Now, he again went (to the king). His time came and he entered into the presence of the king. The king said 'Oh, so-and-so, what did I see in my dream?' 'King, I wish you well, you saw in your dream that it was raining wolves.' 'How did you know?!' 'I knew'. He said 'Give him a thousand gold pieces'.

(15) He again took the thousand gold pieces. He took his thousand gold pieces and went off again. He went to the snake. This time what did he do? He took a big stone. When the snake was coming out, he threw the stone at the snake, to kill the snake. The snake just managed to escape. It went into its hole and hid itself in its hole. (16) From there he went home. He again took the thousand gold pieces to his wife. After one or two more months, he (the king) again had a dream. The king said 'I have again had a dream. He says 'Whoever says what I have seen in my dream, I'll give him a thousand gold pieces'. (17) Again he (the man) said 'What shall I do this time?' He said 'Last time I even threw a stone at the snake. I even wanted to to kill it.' He said 'It will bite me. It will eat me. What should I do?' He set off. He said 'By God, I'll go to the snake and ask him for his forgiveness and say "I promise, I'll divide into halves also all the money that I took, that I took previously."' (18) He set off and arrived again. The snake came out to meet him. It said 'Hey, my friend, what about the stones that you threw at me? Where are you going?' 'I implore you (to forgive me).[7] Do not speak angrily with me. Forgive me. Just one more time tell me what it is. I promise that however much money I have received, I shall bring it and divide, half for me and half for you.' It said 'Really?' He said 'Really!' It said 'Well, I trust you. Say to the king "It is raining lambs. It is raining lambs". (19) Now, he went off. He arrived at the king's (palace). He entered (when) his turn came. 'What did you see in your dream?' He said 'In your dream you see it raining lambs'. He said 'By God, you are right! Also this time you knew it.' He gives him another thousand gold pieces. He went directly home from there. He brought back also those two thousand pieces of gold. (20) He went[8] (to the snake): Greetings my brother snake! Peace and blessings!' He says 'See, I have come. I have brought all the gold pieces. I have three thousand gold pieces on me. These one thousand five-hundred are yours and these one thousand five-hundred are mine. Please (take them), so that you cannot say that he is dishonest.' (21) It said 'Sit down. Let me tell you something. I did not say that you are dishonest. I did not say that you are a murderer. I did not say that you are a good man. I did not say that you are a trickster. But, sit down, I'll tell you something.'

[7] Literally: The protection of God with regard to you.

[8] The verbs here and in the last two clauses are in the imperative form. This is a narrative device to engage the listener.

(22) It said 'The first time you came to me, I said to you that the king saw in his dream that it was raining foxes. The day I said that to you, the time was tricky. So you went off, said (this to the king), took the money and became tricky like the time. The time made you a trickster. (23) You did not come back to me. You went on a circuitous route and went to your wife. You came lying to me, saying '(I did so) on the grounds that I was in debt' and I don't know what, things like that.' (24) It said 'The second time the king saw (in his dream) that it was raining wolves. Also that dream of the king was (like) the time. The day the king saw that it was raining foxes, it was the time of tricks. This time when you saw it raining wolves, it was a time of killing, blood and slaughter, one man eating the other, one killing the other. (25) So you, instead of coming and bringing me money, took a rock. If that rock had hit me, you would have killed me. Actually I hid myself. But again it was not your fault. It was the time of killing. You also, in the time that was one of killing, became a murderer. (26) Now that the king has seen it raining lambs, it is the time of peace. You have not become a good man and brought these coins. The time has become one of peace and you also became a man of peace. (27) Because of this you have brought these coins and want now to divide them.' It said 'Take these coins. They are all for you. I am an angel.' He went up to heaven. 'Peace be with you.' I have left it there and come here.

A2   The Priest and the Mullah

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) One day there was a priest and a mullah. The priest was going to Jerusalem and the mullah was going on the pilgrimage. They went together as far as Jordan. They put up in a hotel. They put up there. Now, the mullah started (talking by) asking the priest 'Where are you going?'. He said 'I am going to Jerusalem. And where are you going?' He says 'I am going to Mecca, but I want to visit also Jerusalem. If I do not visit Jerusalem, my pilgrimage is not accepted.' (2) They put up in the hotel that day and remained there.[1] The evening came and they wanted to eat dinner. 'What shall we eat for dinner?' They said 'Let's go down and buy for ourselves some chickens and come back and cook them ourselves. Why should we go to eat in a restaurant? We could eat them also tomorrow.' They both decided (to do) thus. (3) They go down and buy two chickens and bring them back. The put them in a pan and cook them, then sit down to eat them. They ate one chicken and one remained. The mullah sat in a chair, fell asleep and started snoring. The mullah started snoring, the priest remembered and said (to himself) 'Tomorrow is Friday.' (4) He said 'Tomorrow is Friday. This mullah will eat the chicken and I shall have nothing.[2] What should I do?' He said 'No! (While) he is asleep, I shall shall eat also this one. God is merciful until tomorrow. It was Thursday. The priest had forgotten that the next day would be Friday. The mullah would eat it and he would eat nothing because it was Friday. (5) He put the chicken on the fire to heat it up. (After) it was heated, he sat down to eat it.[3] He ate all the chicken. (Only) bones remained. He put them in the pan and put it aside.[4] The mullah woke up. He said '(Did you sleep) well, mullah?' (6) The mullah said 'Man, give me a break!' I have just now had a dream. Was it (really) a dream? It was a clear vision.' He said 'What was it like?' He said 'Give me a break!' He said 'Was it good? Tell it (to me)!' (7) He says 'I dreamt that I went to Paradise to the next life.' He says 'I went to the door of Paradise and behold the Messiah and Muḥammad were standing in the door of Paradise. The Messiah asked Muḥammad, he said 'Who is that?' He said 'It is my mullah'.

(1) A certain man was rather selfish, that is he was fond of himself. He was always making requests from God, complaining 'I want God to give me something more, give me things', so that God would give him. He was always complaining about his life. (2) Once, the Lord God said to an angel 'Go down, see what he wants. Come, let's see what it is (all about). He is always grumbling and asking (for things), grumbling and asking (for things). He is a big whiner.' (3) The angel went down. He said 'Hey, man, why are always busy asking God to give (things) to you, (with) complaint (after) complaint. He says 'Look, I want God to give me more of everything, so that my life will be good, so that I shall live well here.' (4) He said 'God has said that he will give to you on condition that everything he gives to you he will give to your neighbour twofold. That is, if he gives you one cow, he will give to your neighbour two cows. If he gives to you one ass, he will give to your neighbour two asses. That is, everything that he gives to you, he will give also to your neighbour, twofold.' (5) He says 'Why to my neighbour?' 'I am telling you, God will give to you on this condition, otherwise he will not give to you.' He said 'Wait, let me think (about it).' He thought (about it). The angel went up (to heaven). (6) After three days he returned. He said 'Have you thought (about it)?' He said 'Yes'. 'What are you thinking of?' He said 'Say to the Lord God that I want him to take out one of my eyes.' He said 'Why should he take out one of your eyes?' He said 'So that he takes out both eyes of my neighbour'.

(1) There was or there was not. There was no greater than God. There was once a king. That king had a son, an only son. One day, that son of the king said to his father 'I want to go out hunting, I together with friends, in the mountains, where there were wild goats, such things, partridges, birds, I don't know what. (2) So, he went up into the mountains with his friends and remained in the mountains one or two days. One night they went to sleep and two angels came, passing by the tent of the king. Now, those angels said 'Do you know who that is?' They said 'That is the son of the king.' They said 'Yes'. (3) (One) said 'That son of a king is very good-looking and clever, but there is someone who is good-looking and clever like him, the daughter of the king of the West, let's say'.[1] (The other) said 'What do you say (we do)?' 'Should we take him to her or take her to him?' He said 'No. We shall take him to her.' He said 'The woman is not trustworthy, she may cause him to be killed. Let's bring her to him.' (4) They went and brought that daughter of the king of the West to him. When he saw her, so beautiful and good-looking, she screamed. He said to her 'Don't scream. It was you who came to me. It was not me who came to you.' After she realized that she had come to him, they fell in love with each other. (5) They exchanged rings. Thus they slept together in that love. I'll tell it to you quickly so that it will finish. They slept together in that love. When they woke up, each in their own bed, she in the palace of her father and he in his tent, he, poor man, became very sad and she became mad. (6) On the same day she began—they say the daughter of the king went mad and began to tear her clothes out of madness. Nobody was able to go near her at all. The son of the king called all his friends and said 'Let's return. That's enough. We have done some hunting. That's enough. I have done my hunting.' (7) He said 'I have done my hunting'. He returned home. He returned to his father. He says 'Father, I shall tell you something, between me and you'. He said 'I saw such-and-such things'. Then he (the king) said 'My dear, perhaps you were dreaming.[2] A person always dreams.[3]

(8) He said 'Father, no father. It is not a dream. It is true. This is the ring and this the scarf that we exchanged. Everything is hers.' He said 'Now, what do you want?' He said 'I want you to go and look for her father,[4] and to bring her to me wherever she is.' He said 'Fine'. (9) He does not know whose daughter she is. She did not tell him. He does not know whose daughter she is. Only the angels know. Now, what did they do? The next day the king gave word to his ministers and his prime minister 'Now, I am going to look for a wife for my son. When I return, I shall be bringing the wife.[5] You are the deputy.' (10) The king set off,[6] taking servants with him and (other) people. He went on the road, wandering from village to village, town to town, to see where to find her. On the day that the king left home, on that day his son died. On that day his son died. He (the king) did not know. (11) He travelled on and on and on and on and on. In the end God made him come across the town where the daughter of that king was. He saw the people gathered near the palace of the king, each one saying something, each one telling something. He called to them and said 'What has happened?'[7] (12) They said 'The daughter of the king has gone mad.' 'Why has she gone mad?' They said 'She does not know. She says that she saw the son of a king, we do not know where, and fell in love with him, and she has been mad from the day that she saw him. Nobody can cure her.' (13) He said 'What people do you have who can speak with her and find out how she is?' They said 'We have an old woman who does magic. She goes up to her and comes down, but until now nothing (has come of it)'. He said 'Can you send her to me?' They said 'Yes'. He went to his tent and the old woman came. (14) She came to him and offered greetings. He said 'Do you go to the daughter of the king?' He said 'What is her story?' She said 'Well, her story is like this. She has fallen in love. She found herself with a son of a king and the next day in the morning she found herself in her own bed. From that day she has been mad.' (15) He said 'I'll tell you something.' He first took out a purse of gold pieces. He said 'This is for you, for you to do your job.' 'Oh' she said, she shook them like this, she said 'If there are these (gold pieces), the job will go ahead! I'll take you to any place you want.'

(16) He said 'No. (Take) this apple.' He laid out the handkerchief and cut the apple. He put his (his son's) ring in it and tied the apple in the handkerchief by itself. He said 'Take this apple and this handkerchief. Convey them to her and see what she does, then come back and tell me. When you come back, I'll give you another purse like that one.' (17) She said 'By all means. I'll be there and back at once.' She went up (to see her). She (the princess) is continually acting madly, leaping and jumping around naked in the rooms. She (the old woman) waves the handkerchief before her eyes from a distance like this. She (gradually) came up and up and up and up. When she came near to her and she saw it, she saw the handkerchief, she seemed[8] to become she became a little calmer. (18) It seems, there is something in the story. The old woman went (into the room) to her. She said 'What are you doing? Come! Here it is! Take the handkerchief.' 'Whose is it?' She said that it was her handkerchief. She opened it and the apple was in it. (19) She opened up the apple and there was her ring. She said 'This ring is also mine.[9] Where is the owner of this? Who has given it to you? I'll throttle you right now.' She said 'Wait! Calm down. He is here. It was he who sent me.' 'Where is he? Where is he?' (20) She said 'Wait. Calm down.' She said 'Now bring my clothes and put them on me. I am cured. Nothing is the matter with me.' Her clothes were brought. They put them all on her. (21) Now, they said, the word went out and they said 'The old woman has cured the daughter of the king.' She said 'I'll go down and meet him. Let's see what he will do. (I'll go down) to make an appointment, let's see him.' She says 'Go and tell my father (to give instructions) for them to come and release me from here. I'll go to wash and put on my clothes. I am cured.' (22) The old woman went and said 'Oh King, oh king, I have cured your daughter.' He takes a purse for her and gives it to her. The old woman is all the time collecting bags of gold. Yes, the old woman made (good) business. She says 'Bath her, dress her in her clothes and I'll be back right away. I have something to do.' (23) The king tried (to ask) 'What is happening?' 'You stop (asking questions).' I am in charge of her business.' She went down and says to him (the other king) 'Get up! Things have turned out well. She is cured. Get up! She wants to see you.'

(24) They went up (to see her). The old woman went up to the king. She said 'It was not me who cured your daughter'. She said 'There is the man who…' She does not know. She thinks it is him. She said 'The young man whom she loved has come and has given me her handkerchief. That's all. I am now coming back from him and he wants to come to see you and to see also the girl.' (25) 'Oh' he said 'Go and say we shall come down to meet him. We shall come down to meet him.' They went down to meet him and brought him up (with) drum and pipe, clamour and shouting. They brought him up to the king and they sat talking. (26) The king said 'Oh, tell me, let's hear[10] what the story is.' He said 'I'll tell you. I am the father of that boy. I am a king, like you.' He said 'My son and your daughter saw each other. I came looking and God caused me to find her here. Thank God she has now recovered. (27) Now, what do you say? I have come for you to give her away so that I may take her to my son. Just as your daughter has gone mad, he also, if I do not go back, will go mad.' He said 'You are right'. They went and told the girl and she became very happy. Like the camels that he had brought with him, her father gave her others like these. They loaded them, then they left the town and returned to their land. (28) Now, they returned. (After) one, two, three days they came out opposite their town. But, their town was all covered in black. Black houses, black clothes of people, they were all black. 'How odd! What has happened to you?'[11] (29) She says 'Father, we see that this town of yours is all covered in black. What has happened to you?'—Let's say in blue, let's say it was covered in blue[12]—'Tonight let us sleep here'. (30) He wants to know, find out what had happened. Tomorrow we shall go down. Such is our custom. Beforehand we give word for them to come out to meet us, to bring us down (into the town) with honour. I am a king. (31) (When) she fell asleep, he sent (a messenger) and one of the farmers came. He called to him and said 'Why is this town like this?' He did not know that he was the king. He said 'Do you not know what has happened? It is a very sad story. We had a king. He was such a good man. He was so good. The people used to love him.

(32) This king of ours went away. From the day that he went, went to bring a girl for his son,—on the day he left, his son died. We have not installed (another) king after him but have covered all our village with blue and black after he left.[13] We shall make it white when he returns.' (33) He said 'Is that the story?' He said 'Did his son die?' He said 'Yes, his son died'. He says 'Go and tell the minister so-and-so, say the king has come back. I do not want them to come in sadness, weeping and singing dirges. Let them come with the drum and pipe and with guns, in an official reception. I do not want this girl whom I have brought to know that her betrothed has died.' (34) He went and said to the minister '(By) early morning I want all the town as (it was) before, made white. Let the black be removed. Now, he gave word to the minister on the same night. They painted the whole town and it became white like before. (35) They lined up in the early morning and went up to receive the king, as they (customarily) receive kings, with honour, while she was watching, peering like this to see her betrothed, but she does not see him. She says 'Father, was this town not black yesterday? We see today that it is white.' (36) He said 'My daughter, it is because we were tired that it appeared like that to your eyes. It was always white.' She looks in vain and says 'Where is your son? Let's see him.' He does not tell. 'I also do not know'. She said 'Perhaps their custom is that on the first day the groom is not allowed to see the bride.' (37) Then she went down and went up (to the palace). He took her up to the third floor, to her room. He said 'It is your room'. There were servants on this side and that. He went down to his wife. They began weeping, beating themselves and putting ash on themselves. (38) Now, one day, two, three, she looks in vain from the windows to see her betrothed coming and going, but sees nobody. What has happened to him?[14] Almost a month went by (since their arrival) and then the king said to his wife 'What will become of her? We have brought that woman. We must tell (her). (39) She will surely know one day that our son is dead. We cannot go and tell her. If she wants to stay, let her stay here in the place of our son and she will be queen in my place when I die. But, if she wants to return to her father's house, I shall put her again (on a camel) and return her.'

I want you to go down and build a room over his grave, (in which I shall be) all the time that I am alive until the day that I also die and they put me with him. They tried all ways[19] (to convince her to change her decision), but she said 'That is it. There is nothing else (that is possible)'. (44) He went down and built a room over the grave of his son. She continued weeping. She continued weeping and weeping and weeping, one day, two, one month. Then, those two angels who had brought her, who had caused them to meet each other, came passing by. One of them said 'What sound of weeping is this?' (45) The other said 'Do you not know what sound of weeping it is? Do you remember the couple that we brought together?' 'Yes'. He said 'and in the end we took her betrothed and she remained alive. This girl has come here. They brought her. She says 'I shall stay here until the day I die'. She will live another sixty years. That is, she will stay another sixty years weeping over that grave.' (46) He said 'What do you want us to do?' 'Let's ask her. (47) They went into her room and greeted her. 'Greetings to you!' 'Peace and blessings! What are you doing here? Where do you come from?' They said 'Sit down'. They said 'We are angels. This husband of yours has died. It was us who took him. You will live here another sixty years. Will you stay sitting here sixty years over this grave?' She said 'Yes. Not sixty years, two hundred years I shall be here.' (48) They said 'There is something that we want to do for you. Sixty years is too much for you to sit here weeping and destroying yourself.' She said 'What is it?' They said 'You will live another sixty years. If you divide your years, thirty for you and thirty for him, we shall resurrect him. What do you say?' (49) She says 'Look. Just let him rise for me to see him for five minutes, and all the other (sixty years) be for him.' They said 'No. That is not possible. Thirty for you and thirty for him. If you want this, that is fine. If you don't want it,…' She said 'I am happy (to accept)'. They said 'Are you happy (to accept)?' She said 'I am happy'. (50) They went out and he arose. They began kissing each other. They were (completely) preoccupied with each other. They lay down and slept. Every morning the servant of that girl brought her tea and breakfast, then would go back. How happy they were together, lying down and sleeping, embracing one another. (51) She came down and opened the door, and came in like this and there was a prince lying with her! She said 'It was for this reason, it was for this reason that she said "Build me a room over the grave of my husband", namely in order that she could bring somebody to her every day and cause him to lie with her.' (52) She ran, went up and told the king. He said 'What is the matter?' She said 'King, a man has come. You have built her a room there for her to entertain somebody everyday. A giant from here to there (in size) is lying with her.' 'What are you saying?' She said 'Go down and look'. (53) The king set off (with) the ministers and the police and they surrounded the house. While they were going down, a cat came in. She (the servant) had left a tray there. A cat came in, fell into the glasses, they shattered and they (the prince and princess) woke up. (54) When they woke up, she says 'Get up!. The servant has come. She has seen you with me. She has gone up to tell your father, and now they will come to slaughter us.' 'What are you saying?' he said. 'There is tea. She has seen you lying with me.' (55) Now, he got up. He quickly put on his clothes and stood at the door of the house together with her. His father and the others came and looked from afar. 'Who is he?' He came close. He said 'Father, it is me.' He said 'Yes, it is my son, he has risen (from the dead)' and they came together and embraced and kissed one another.

(56) A (great) joy arose among the people, something remarkable. They became so happy. They brought them up (to the palace) with drum and pipe and the firing of rifles. In this way they held the wedding. The wedding was for seven days and seven nights. He married them. (57) So, after they married, God gave them a son. When? The year they were to die. The year they were to die, He gave them a small son. Now, the night they were to die, they came and sat down, the wife sitting on this side of the table and the husband sitting on the other side. (58) They put the small child in the middle. She is kissing and kissing and kissing him and hugging him to her breast. Then she gives him to his father. He also kisses and kisses and kisses him. (59) The angels have come and have sat by the window. They are waiting by the window for the time to finish, for them to put down the child so that they could take away their soul. (60) There were stoves in our community that were smoke ducts. Some of the soot went up and entered the nose of one of the angels. He went 'achoo!' He sneezed. The little boy said 'Bless you!' When the little one said 'Bless you', he (the angel) said 'Bless your father and mother. May each live another fifty years. The angels got up and returned. I have left it there and come here.

A5 THE COOKING POT

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) Once mullah Naṣradin wanted to cook pača. He did not have a cooking pot. He said to his wife 'Go to our neighbours and bring a cooking pot so that we can cook some pača. She went, brought the cooking pot and cooked the pača. (2) He said 'Wife, this cooking pot is very nice, I like it a lot.'[1] She said 'But it is the cooking pot of our neighbours. What will you do with it?' He said 'I think this cooking pot should eventually belong to me.' She said 'What will the neighbours say to us?' He said 'That's not your business. Don't tell!' (3) She said 'No, what business is it of mine? Do whatever you want.' He said 'Go and bring the small cooking pot. Put it in it and take it to our neighbours' house.' He said 'No. I shall take it.' He said 'Bring it!' (4) She went and brought her cooking pot. She put the small one in the cooking pot of the neighbours and took it (to her husband). Now, go and take the cooking pot and go to the house of your neighbour![2] 'Greeings to you neighbours.' They said 'Welcome'. (5) He said 'I have brought your cooking pot. She (the neighbour) came and saw it and said 'Neighbour, what is that small one in it.' He said 'Neighbours, did you not say that this cooking pot is on the way (to giving birth)? It came to me and gave birth.' (6) 'How could it be that a cooking pot has given birth?!' He said 'How? But the cooking pot that I have brought you is an extra one for you. Your cooking pot was on the way (to giving birth) and it gave birth in our house. Now, I have brought another cooking pot.' (7) She persisted, but the husband said 'Leave it. He has brought another cooking pot. What is the matter with you? Say "Yes, you are right."' She went and took the cooking pot, 'Thank you very much', and the mullah went away. (8) A week later, he said to his wife 'Go and bring the cooking pot of the neighbours. Say we want to cook pače in it.' The wife went and requested it. 'Give it quickly', she said, 'Perhaps it will give birth to two others.' They gave the cooking pot to the mullah. The mullah brought it (home). He did not make pača but buried the pot. (9) One day, two, three, a month (went by). Now, the husband said to his wife 'Where is the cooking pot?' She said 'The mullah took it.' He said 'Go and bring it.' She went and said 'Neighbour, where is the mullah?' She said 'He is in the house.' 'Mullah, where is the cooking pot? I have come looking for it.'

Today when it has died, you are sad about it. It has died.' She remonstrated 'Surely it is here!' He said 'It has died. He buried it and it disappeared. So, the cooking pot became the mullah's.'

A6   A Hundred Gold Coins

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) Let's see what mullah Naṣraddin did on another occasion. He was at home, walking up and down,[1] walking up and down, saying 'Oh God, give me a hundred gold pieces. If they are ninety-nine, I shall return them. If they are even one hundred and one, I don't want them. That's that.[2] They must be exactly a hundred. (2) Well, (while) he was going back and forth, he had a Jewish neighbour who was listening to him. He said 'Let's see whether he is truthful. I'll test him.' He went up to the roof and put ninety-nine gold coins in a bag, then put it by the window. 'Oh, wife, come! Look God has sent it to us.' (3) She brought a tray. They poured them out and began counting them one by one. They came to ninety-nine. (They counted them) two by two, (but still) ninety-nine. Ten by ten, still ninety-nine. He says 'Wife, it is right. God does not make a mistakes. (They are) ninety-nine, but according my opinion, he has reckoned this bag as one. Here take (them). Put them over there.' (4) The Jew on the roof jumped down into their midst 'It was me who sent them!' 'Oh (you) dog' he says 'listening there on the roof! So you want to take these (coins). Prepare yourself. Tomorrow we shall go to the the judge.' The Jew has lost ninety-nine gold coins. How could he sleep? Right up to the morning he did not sleep. He just went up and down. (5) The mullah lay down his head, lay down and slept sweetly,[3] with the gold coins under his head. At six in the morning, the Jew came making a knock-knock-knock at the door. He calls at the door 'What is happening?' (6) The mullah opened the door (and saw) that the Jew was wearing a smart suit and new clothes. He had saddled his donkey and groomed it well.[4] 'What is this for?' He said 'We are going to the judge.' He said 'Go away, dog. I shall not come with you'. 'Why won't you come with me?' 'Go away, I shall not come with you.' (7) 'Why? What is the problem?' He said 'Everybody knows.[5] They will see these clothes of yours like this, the smart suit and this donkey of yours, with the saddle, while I am in these plain clothes and slippers, all dirty, and the judge will make a sentence in your favour.

A7   A Man Called Čuxo

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) I shall tell you another one called Čuxo. This Čuxo lives in a village, let's say in one of the villages of our community in Barwar. He was a shepherd of sheep and a minder of cattle. He was everything. He was poor. The people of the village used to call him Čuxo. On every occasion that he spoke (people would say) Čuxo, Čuxo, Čuxo. (2) One day he appealed to the head of the village saying[1] 'Change this name. This name of mine, Čuxo, Čuxo, Čuxo. Give me another name. He said 'We shall change your name. Go and slaughter your ox. Invite all the people of the village and hold a party. We shall finish eating, then drink and get drunk. (When) we finish, we shall give you a new name and leave.' (3) So, he went out and slaughtered his ox. He cooked it and (prepared) everything, and brought drink. He invited young and old saying 'Come, come, you are invited' in order for them to change the name Čuxo and give him a another name. They came. They ate and drank. They enjoyed themselves and got drunk, until one or two o'clock after midnight. (4) They began to disperse. Everyone who got up to leave (said) 'Thank you Čuxo' (Each) went out 'Thank you', 'Thank you', 'Thank you', and his name was still Čuxo. They left. He said to the village head 'What did I say to you? You ate my ox. you ate such-and-such. You ate everything. You drank. You enjoyed yourselves. But my name was still Čuxo.' (5) The next day he went up onto the roof saying 'Hey, everyone who has eaten my dinner[2] in my house, let him comse and defecate in my house. All the people of the village came and performed their business. He remained there for a month or two, then he gathered them all up, dried them, and put them in a saddle bag. (6) He went down, down, down and became the guest of an Arab sheikh in a desert. He put his saddle bag near the tent of that Arab and sat down. Čuxo was a pipe-player and a first class singer. He sat at night playing a pipe on that saddle bag of his, with his ass beside him.

(7) The Arab heard his voice. He says 'Who is he? The sheikh says 'But, how could this be?! (How could it be that) I am the sheikh[3] and people do not come to my reception and do not become my guest, but sit far away. How could you have agreed for that stranger who has come here alone into the desert to sit and sing and have not brought him to me?! Go and bring him to me.' (8) Those servants of his went and saw that Čuxo sitting on the saddle bag singing, with a pipe in his hand. 'Greetings to you!' He said 'Peace and blessings'. They said 'The sheikh has sent for you saying "We are Arabs. It is not our custom that you should come and sit outside" that is (it is not our custom) that if a stranger comes, he should not come to him. (9) According to our custom, you must come to us and eat and drink. Whatever you want, we shall do for you. That is, it is not good (like this), you must come.' He said 'Well, I'll come, only if the sheikh gives a guarantee that this saddle bag will be guarded so that nothing will happen to it, for I have something very valuable in it.' (10) They went and told the sheikh. He said 'Of course, even if it is gold, we shall give him threefold (if it is lost)'. He went (to the sheikh) and sang until morning. At dawn he went back to his saddle bag. He began beating his head yelling in anguish 'Oh what a calamity! Help for God's sake! So, this is how a sheikh behaves. This is how he makes a guarantee.' (11) 'What is the matter?' He says 'Come and see! My saddle bag was full of gold' He said 'They have stolen all the gold, all of it and put filth in its place.' 'How could that be?' They came and saw that the saddle bag was completely full of filth. The sheikh had given his word. It was one saddle bag of gold, so he wrote (that he should have) three saddle bags. (12) He gave him three other asses. They put the three saddles on their back. Čuxo set off for home and went up (the mountain). They say 'Čuxo has come back. We see that he went down with one saddle bag of excrement and he has come back with three saddle bags. What has happened? We do not know.' (13) He came all the way up and entered the village. 'What is it Čuxo?' He says 'They are gold coins'. 'What kind of gold are they?' They said 'You went down with a saddle bag of excrement and you have come back with three of gold.'

(14) He said 'Damn you!⁴ In Moṣul dung is not available. One kilo of dung sells for three gold pieces.' 'What are you saying?' 'It's like that, here they are!' What did the people do? (After) the matter got about in the village, everyone fought with one another and gathered excrement. (15) After they had gathered it, they went down (to the plain). They laid it out in one of those auction houses of Moṣul and started crying 'Dung for gold! Dung for gold!' The inhabitants of Moṣul gathered and said 'Dogs sons of dogs!' They gave them a sound beating. They also took their asses and drove away their mules. (16) 'Oh' they say 'That dog son of a dog Čuxo, what has he done to us? This time we'll go up and kill Čuxo.' They went up. Čuxo knows what he has done to them. When he saw them coming, shouting and angry, Čuxo ran out into the village, he running and they (coming) after him. (17) He went and saw a grazer of sheep, a shepherd. He says 'Let me tell you something, my friend. Do me a favour. Do you see those people who are running after me?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'I have a cousin who is as beautiful as this sunshine. (18) They want to marry her to me by force. Come, give your clothes to me and (I'll give) my clothes to you. Then go and say "Yes, yes, I shall marry her. Yes, yes, I agree, I agree." They will think that you are me. Say "My name is Čuxo" and you will have no trouble.' (19) They exchanged clothes. He (the shepherd) went and lowered the hat of Čuxo over his eyes. He said 'I agree, I agree, I agree!' They came up to him (and he received) a (blow) from that one and a (blow) from another. They take him and throw him in the Zab. 'We have got rid of Čuxo. We've put him in the Zab.' (20) Having put him in the Zab, they returned home. 'We have done such-and-such to him, its his comeuppance.'⁵ Some say 'Why have you killed the man?' He should have remained alive. Although he did such a thing, we had eaten his ox. We have now done this to him. Some supported him and others were against him. (21) The evening came. At six or seven o'clock in the evening, at dusk, Čuxo came, with a horde of sheep following him. He came down into the village and stood in front of his house. 'Who is he?' 'Who is he?' He says 'I am Čuxo'. 'We have drowned Čuxo! He has come out of the Zab.'

(22) They came and said 'Čuxo, well, have we not drowned you?' He said 'Yes'. 'But what are you doing here?' He said 'Damn you![6] You threw me into a shallow place. If you had thrown me a little further along, (where it is) deeper, I would have brought out for you from there some of those big sheep with fat tails and horns (big) like this. But that place was shallow. You put me there and I have only brought these.' (23) 'What are you saying?' He says 'Do you see the Zab? It is full of sheep, every type you could want.' 'Come on, for God's sake show us!' He brought up all the people of the village there, one after the other. (24) One came up and said 'Čuxo, throw me in a place where there are hornless sheep, since the door of my basement stable is narrow. My grandmother says "Don't bring the ones with horns. Bring the ones that are hornless"'. He said 'Where is grandma?' He said 'There she is'. He said 'Come'. He said 'Here they are all hornless sheep'. He takes him and threw him[7] like this. (25) A gurgling noise started. They said 'What is he saying, my friend?' He said 'He is saying "Tell my grandmother to come and help me. I cannot bring them out."' He threw in also his grandmother after him, splash!' He drowned all the people of the village. Čuxo then went and sat down. He said 'So, don't change my name!'

(1) I have heard a story called Gozali and Nozali. Its name is the story of Gozali and Nozali. What was this?[1] We used to begin a story by saying: (2) There was and there was not, there was no man greater than God. But there was a king who had a son. The king loved his son very much. Of course the son would take the place of the king. When the king dies, when he becomes old, his son would take his place after him. (3) Now, one day the king was asleep at night, he was asleep, and he saw in his dream that there was a man in the town who was poorer than anybody else. The man was very poor. The king saw in his dream that they said 'This poor man will have a son and he will become king instead of your son. Your son will not become king'. (4) When the king woke from his sleep, he became very shaken and became very upset. It happened that that poor man was well-known, everybody knew him very well. The king knew the man. He said 'This poor man, this man who is so wretched, how can his son become king? How can he become king instead of my son and (how) can this kingdom of mine and this wealth of mine all become his?' (5) This did not please him, his dream did not please him. This man, however, still did not have (a son), that is his wife was not expecting a child.[2] Several years went by and the king kept investigating and inquiring concerning the man: Has he or has he not a son? Will he have a son? Things such as these. Then, in the end, a report came to the king saying that his wife was expecting a child. The wife of the poor man was on the way to giving birth to children. (6) The king began to be rather afraid and think that his dream would come true. Let's say it was the time of giving birth and the woman gave birth. She gave birth to twins, two children, a boy and a girl. Those two children, from their birth, from the first day (after) they were born, were so beautiful, so fine, so bonny and sweet that people marvelled at them. They say in the story regarding them that one forelock, one hair, of his was of gold and one was of silver. They compared them in this way.

(7) The king heard about this and became very afraid. He said: If they are so beautiful and so fine, that dream of mine must come true. The thing is a vision that came to me, it is not a dream. He was very afraid. What did he do? He thought and said (to himself): I have to get rid of these children. He said: I have to get rid of these children. They must not live. They will now take all the wealth (of the kingdom) and will take my place. My son will have no title[3] and will not be king. How could this happen? (8) Now, what did he do? He said to the police, he said: Go to the the house of such-and-such a man. Go to the house of such-and-such a man, and take away the two children. Get rid of them. Do not leave them alive.[4] Get rid of them. This was (done) secretly, so that nobody would know about it. (9) Now, what should the police do? They take orders. Whatever the king tells them they should do. They went off. The police went off at night and took the two children from their father and mother. How their mother and father began to cry and scream: 'How can you take our children away?! How can that come about? What has happened?' You see, it was the order of the king and they cannot disobey it. (10) The police stopped the father and mother (screaming) and took the two children. When the policemen took the two children, the policemen began to become worried. They said: How can we do away with these two children, who are so beautiful and bonny, babies who have just been born? It is a sin. What orders has the king given us? It is impossible for us to do this thing. (11) The policemen felt compassion in their hearts.[5] They said 'We shall put them in a chest and give them some cakes, putting them in their hands for them to eat. What a pity for them! Then we shall put them in the stream. The stream will flow along and take them somewhere.[6] The water will flow along and they will perish by themselves. We cannot ourselves do away with them, it is a sin'. (12) They did as (they said they would). The policemen found the two beautiful children, put them in a chest, gave them some food, wrapped them up, like this, so that they would not be cold, and put them in the water. They put them in the water, so that they would go along in the stream. They went along in the stream, they went along for a long time.[7]

(13) There was a place where the stream wound round, it was bendy like this, it was not straight. They became hooked to some branches of willows that were there. The chest became hooked to them. They had travelled a long way, they had travelled one or two kilometres, or thereabouts.

(14) So, they stayed there for that day. The next day the son of the king by chance, the son of the king came walking along there. He saw that in the stream there was a chest. He said: I'd like to see what is in the chest. He went (to the chest) and saw the two children, shining, beautiful, with blond hair, just like silver, so pretty and bonny. (15) He said: Oh Lord God, who could have put these two children in the stream? Who could have thrown them here? We must care for them and look after them. I must investigate to find out who has done this to these people. The son of the king went and took them by himself. He took them and he took the chest in his hands, then went up and brought them up to his father. (16) He said: Father. He said: Yes my son. He said: I have found something amazing. He said: What, my son? What have you found? He said: I have found these two children, without parents, thrown in this chest and thrown in the stream. Take a look at them. See how beautiful these children are, how they captivate one's heart.[8] How could people have have done such a terrible thing to them and thrown them in (into the stream). (17) Well, his father looked and he knew, he knew that this was (by) his command. He cannot any longer run away from reality. What should he do? He does not dare to say in front of his son: It is me. He said 'My son, do whatever you think best.[9] You see I do not know from where they came.' He was afraid to tell his son. Perhaps his son would make a vendetta against his father. You see, he is his son, (how) can he say to him: Why would you do this thing? It would not be good. (18) What did the boy, the son of the king, say? He said: Father, I shall care for these children, that is I shall look after them. I shall not let servants, you, mother or anybody (look after them). I myself shall look after them, with regard to their food, their clothing, their sleeping, their eating, their care. I shall not leave them, I shall not be separated from them. I must be with them everyday. (19) His father said: I cannot (bear this) anymore. This has come about by the hand of my son. It appears that my dream is coming true. He began to fear his dream, which he had dreamt.

(20) Now—we shall not prolongate (the story) too much—they grew up. They grew up. Now, our story will change from this branch and go to another branch. That is, so far the story of these (children) has been told. Now we shall begin another branch, which has a connection with that and is related to it.

(21) There was a woman who was very beautiful. What was her name? Bəlbəl Hazar. Where is she? She is on the top of a high mountain, a very high mountain. People cannot climb up it. It is like the summit of Everest, as high as that. Before it lies barren countryside, a very large plain. (22) When people at that time heard that Bəlbəl Hazar was very beautiful, kings, rich people, important people, everybody tried to bring Bəlbəl Hazar (as a wife) for their son, for a son (of theirs, who was) a handsome young prince, at that time. How did they go? They would go towards the rising of the sun. They knew that Bəlbəl Hazar was in mountain (lying) towards the rising of the sun. (23) They would go to the rising of the sun. Before they arrived there, at that mountain, an angel would come down from the sky and make himself into a man. He would make himself into an old man, with a white beard and white hair. (There was) a house, only a room, a small house, we say kullixa (hut) in Assyrian. A kullixa is like a sopiθa (shed), as we say. (24) This was the house of the old man. He would ask the people: Where are you going? They were sitting on the back of a horse, with their spear like this, you know what they were like, the people who at that time went around on horseback. When the old man said: Where are you going? They would say: We are going to bring Bəlbəl Hazar to marry her to our son. (25) He was an angel. He knew the story of Bəlbəl Hazar. He knew that it was very difficult. Nobody could bring back Bəlbəl Hazar. Bəlbəl Hazar had a secret (as to what would make her) come. Only God knew that secret. Also the angel knew it, but he did not reveal it to people. This was a big secret. (26) When he asked them in this way, he would say: Don't go! It is a pity for you, for if you go, you will not be able to bring her back, but will destroy yourselves. They, however, still insisted on going. He would say 'Are you still going to go?' and they would say 'Yes, we shall go'. (27) He would say 'All right, I'll give you instructions in order that you go on a road by which you can reach her. From then onwards you are by yourselves, whether you can bring her back or not bring her back. If you do not bring her back, (remember that) you are saying (now) "We shall still go, there is no alternative, we must go."'

(28) (When) they went there, what did they do? 'Then' he said 'you should go to the cave, the cave is very high. You should cry 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar'. He said 'Pay attention. If Bəlbəl Hazar comes, the bird will come down from there and sit on the back of the horse behind you. If she does not come, at the first call, take a look at the legs of your horse. If the legs of your horses have become stone, you will no longer be able to move. (29) Three times you will call and you will end up as stone, you will become (completely) stone and will no longer be able to move. You, your horses, your spears and your clothes will become stone there. If Bəlbəl Hazar comes, she will come and you can bring her back.' They say 'OK, we want to go'. 'Go then, go! May God be with you'. They would sleep in his house that night. They would get up in the morning. He would say 'May God be with you. Go!' and they would go.

(30) What should I say to you. Hundreds of people went to bring back Bəlbəl Hazar. They would arrive there. At the first cry, they would look at the legs of their horse (and see that the part) up to the knees of the horse had become stone. On the second cry 'Bəlbəl Hazar!', they looked but Bəlbəl Hazar was not there. They checked the legs of their horse and behold, its leg, up to its middle had become stone. Only the head of the horse and its upper half had not become stone. (31) They would cry a third cry 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar!' When he uttered (the syllable) 'zar' at the end, he would all become stone. It looked like[10] a statue of stone (consisting of) the horse, spears, people sitting on its back. It was just in the form of a man and a horse, with weapons, since it had become stone. Now, everybody who went (there) stood next to another person (who had already become stone). Everybody who went would stand (with the others until) they became about four or five hundred people in rows, all turned to stone. This is the story of Bəlbəl Hazar.

(32) Now, let's return to the king, the king and his son and Gozali and Nozali. Let's see what is happening there. The son of the king became ill. He became ill and the king said 'Try to bring doctors, or fine people who know about the illness. Bring all the people in the town so that they can find out why my son has become ill in this way and cure him.'

As soon as Bǝlbǝl Hazar arrives here he will be cured, that is your son will be cured.' (34) The king said 'Who can bring Bǝlbǝl Hazar back? Everybody who goes on that road does not return.' The king stood and thought 'Why should I not send Gozali? Gozali is very handsome and is very strong. Perhaps he can bring her back. If he brings Bǝlbǝl Hazar back, she will become my daughter-in-law, the wife of my son, and my son will be cured. If he does not bring her back, (it would) also (be good since) he would perish and I would be free of him. He would perish.' (35) He had set a plan to kill two birds with one stone.[12] Now, he thought (of this plan) and said to Gozali, he said 'Gozali, come here. My son is sleeping, poor boy, and knows nothing about this business. He is asleep.' He said 'Gozali come (here)!' He said 'What is it?' 'The situation is like this. You know my son. He loves you a lot and you also love him a lot. Now, the doctors have said such-and-such. The leading people have said such-and-such. The learned people have said such-and-such.' (36) He said 'I would like you to bring Bǝlbǝl Hazar for my son, so that he will be cured. It would be a big achievement on your part if my son is cured. I think you will try to bring her, is that not so? He said 'King, may you be well.' He said 'I shall ransom myself in order for your son to get better.' He said '(For the sake of) the kindness that your son has done for to me, I must go and bring Bǝlbǝl Hazar to your son.' (37) He said 'But I want a horse that is black, that has some jewelry in its white forehead, that has white legs, a horse that is very beautiful. Also you should have a saddle made for me by those (craftsmen) who make saddles, in those shops, so that there will not be another saddle as fine as it, so that I can sit on its back, so that when Bǝlbǝl Hazar sees me, she will be keen to come to me and for me to bring her to your son.' (39) Gozali sat—thud—on the back of the horse. He put his feet in the stirrups and got up onto the back of the horse. He then went off towards the East.[13] As my brother-in-law Warda from Halmun used to say, he travelled a stage of three days (journey) in five minutes. He drove (his horse) hard and went along. (40) He went along and the angel of the Lord God, the old man, came down to meet him. He came down, thud. It is evening, it is getting dark, the sun has set, it is getting dark and he is still riding in the countryside, riding on the back of the horse. All of a sudden he found himself on a road, and saw there a hut,[14] a small house, and an old man sitting there with a long beard, he was sitting in front of the door of the house. (41) He said 'Greetings to you, old man'. He raised his head 'Well, hello, hello'. He said 'I have heard about this beauty. Are you not Gozali?' He said 'Old man, how[15] did you know that I am Gozali?' He said 'By God, it just occurred to me'. He said 'That face of yours, so handsome, so comely, and indeed it is you, I have heard about you. There is nobody with such a (beautiful) figure as yours. That is how I knew you.' (42) He said 'Now, what do you want?' He said 'Come, stay tonight as my guest. Where are you going? He says 'No. I have a long way to go. I have a long way to go and there is a duty ahead of me that I must carry out quickly, because the son of the king is ill. If I do not do this task, the son of the king will pass away, die, his life will be lost.' (43) He said 'Gozali, I'll tell you, listen to me. I am an old man, advanced in age. I have a lot of experience in the world. Do not be hasty. Do not hurry. Do as I say. Sit down.' He calmed him down. Gozali was very clever. He said (to himself) 'I'll take advice from the old man. I'll accept good (advice) from him. I'll see what he'll say to me, what he'll advise me (to do). Then I'll go. I shall not stay here.' (44) He said 'I'll stay (tonight only)'. He came down from his horse. He said 'Good. You want to go and bring back Bəlbəl Hazar, right? I understand what is happening. Do you want to bring Bəlbəl Hazar back?' He said 'Yes! The son of the king is ill. I must bring Bəlbəl Hazar to him.' He said 'I advise you, as I have said to all those who have gone this way, and say to you that if you (want to) do as I say, do so. If you do not do so, it is up to you. I cannot do anything more for you.'

(45) He said 'Fine. Say what you want.' He said 'Do not go. Everyone who has gone on this road has not returned.' He said 'I'll still go'. However much the old man tried—he, as we said, was an angel, whom God had sent there, he said 'I'll still go.' He said 'Will you still go?' He said 'Yes!' (46) He said 'Look, I'll give you instructions from now on. You go off on the road that I direct you on.[16] You should go as you are going towards the East, until you arrive in the East. Go two or three more stages, that is you should ride on horseback two or three more days, then you'll arrive in that place. (47) You will see there a high mountain, before which there is a plain. Your friends who went before you to bring Bəlbəl Hazar are lined up there. They have all become stone. I said to them, I said (to them what to do). Go and stand next to the last one (in line). The cave is on top of the mountain. You will see it on top of the mountain. Bəlbəl Hazar is in this cave. (48) Nobody can reach there, since the place is so high and since there is such a huge rock on all sides. Bəlbəl Hazar lives there in a her own special way.[17] She can live there but another person cannot live there.' He said 'Stand next to the others, your friends, and call out. Say "Oh Bəlbəl Hazar!"' He says 'Look at the legs of your horse. If they have become stone, you also will become stone. Call up to three times. The third time, all of you will become stone. (49) If Bəlbəl Hazar comes, (if) she has seen that you are a handsome youth or fallen in love with you and wants to come, has made up her mind (to come) saying "He has come!"—perhaps she knows that you are Gozali', he said 'Perhaps she will come, so then what should you do? Take her onto the back of the horse and come back.' (50) He said 'A hearty goodbye. You have instructed me. I did not know that. You have given me (valuable) instructions. Thank you.' He said 'Sleep here today. You and I will enjoy ourselves until the morning. In the morning, go (on your way)! You are tired. Do as I say!' He said 'Since you have said these things to me and have given me instructions, I'll do as you say'. (51) He did as he said. He went to sleep. He had several travel beds as we call them. He slept awhile there until morning. Early, before the breaking of dawn, Gozali did not tarry.[18] He rose early before dawn broke. He said to the old man. 'Get up! Get up! I'm leaving you, goodbye. I'm going'.

(52) He said 'Are you going already?' He said 'Yes!'. He said 'May God be with you. Go! God willing when you return I'll see Bəlbəl Hazar with you.' He said 'Goodbye' and sat once again on the back of his black horse. He put his feet in the stirrups and went up onto the saddle, which was made by the town craftsmen, an excellent, first class one. (53) He set his sights on the East and rode off. He went along. What shall we say? We shall not protract (the story) too much. My father-in-law Warda said (when telling the story) 'he travelled a stage of three days in five minutes' and arrived in front of the mountain. He arrived in front of the mountain, he looked and was amazed. He directed his attention to those armies. All the armies had become stone. (54) They were armed with weapons, they included the top soldiers, their horses were very fine. They had the appearance of warriors, young men. They were all armed with weapons, with their sword on one side,[19] they looked[20] well prepared, that is very fine with their weapons. (55) He said 'All these have come but have not taken Bəlbəl Hazar. Will she come to me? His heart started pounding slightly. Yes, he was rather frightened. He said 'Perhaps also I shall not take her away, I shall not be able to take Bəlbəl Hazar away.' He said 'Well after all, surely I am not going to break the promise of the king, surely I am not going to return (empty-handed). Would not that be a shame on me? (If) I, Gozali, go and say to the king that I could not bring her, come let me turn into stone, (I am) no better than all these. Let me also turn into stone.' (56) He stood with the last one (in the row). He sees that the last one is new, that he has come perhaps a week ago. Dust had settled on all the others and their colour had changed a little. He stood and thought. He said 'Oh my sister Nozali, I have left you and I am in a predicament now. I do not know whether I am alive, whether I shall return and see you. (57) Only Nozali, his sister, came to his mind. He thinks of nothing (else) in the world, not even his death or his pleasure. He says 'Let me die. But, if only I could see my sister Nozali. He took courage and directed his attention to the cave, which was above, and cried 'Oh, Bəlbəl Hazar!' He looked, nothing came out of the cave. (58) He looked at the legs of his horse and saw that up to the knees of the horse it had turned stone. He said 'Oh, my way is the same'. He said 'I have come on the same way as these people. This is the end of me'. He took heart and (cried) a second cry 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar!' Nothing. He looked, his legs had turned to stone up to his waist, and also his hands.

He knows what his fate will be. He called: 'Oh Bəlbəl—' he pronounced 'Hazar' and turned into stone. Also Gozali had turned to stone! Now, what can we do from now on?

(60) Now what should I tell you? Gozali was absent for one day. Gozali was absent for two days, three days. Nozali waited, Gozali was not there. She said to the king 'Oh King, may you be well. You have sent my brother. My brother has gone and not come back. Now I am thinking that he will not come back any more, since I have heard that many people have gone that way but nobody has returned and come back. (61) My brother has gone and I must go after my brother. I must go on the road that he has gone on. If he is dead I must die. If he returns, I shall return with him. If he brings back Bəlbəl Hazar, he and I will bring back Bəlbəl Hazar. If not, both of us have will die'. (62) He said 'Will you do this for me?' She said 'Yes! Prepare a white horse for me, with black legs and a black star on its forehead'—the opposite of that of her brother. She requests a white horse. Now the king said 'Anything you want will be prepared for you'. After three days, every thing was prepared, just as it was done for Gozali, so was it done for Nozali.

(63) She got up early the next morning and put her feet in the stirrups. She was so beautiful, as my father-in-law Warda used to say, that (when) she swallowed a raisin, it could be seen, ring by ring in her neck.[21] She sat on the back of the horse. She faced the East, and away she went, she went, as Gozali her brother had gone, but even faster than him, since she wanted so much to find where Gozali was. She had more motivation to go and see what was happening. (64) In short—we shall not prolong (the story)—the angel of God the Father came down to meet her, in the same place as he had come down to meet Gozali. He said 'Ah, Nozali. Where are you going? Are you looking for your brother? He knew what the story was. She said 'Yes! Who are you?' He said 'I gave instructions to the your brother, but he did not listen to me. I shall give instructions also to you. If you (want to) obey me, obey me. If you do not obey me, go and bring your brother and find where he is (yourself)'.

(65) She said 'What is the story of my brother? Do you know something about him? He said 'Yes!' He said 'You have heard about Bəlbəl Hazar and you know what a beautiful woman Bəlbəl Hazar is and where she is shut away in a mountain, in a cave. Nobody can reach her, she only comes of her own will. Many people went before your brother and could not do anything. You also are saying "I want to go". I say to you: Do not go!' (66) She said 'No. I shall still go. I must see my brother.' 'I shall instruct you, as I instructed your brother'. He said everything (to her), he said 'If you go there, your brother is the last one (in the row). Dust has not yet settled on him. (67) Your brother, as I have seen, is handsome, just as you are pretty, so he is like you. You will know your brother. His shape, the stone that has become a stature is white like snow, like milk. The shape of his spear is like this. His horse is black. (The mark) that is on its forehead is white'. He gave all the descriptions. (68) He said 'You should stand by his side and call Bəlbəl Hazar. If Bəlbəl Hazar comes, (fine) she comes. If she does not come, you and your brother will be like a pair.'[22] She said 'I want (to do) that'. He said 'Do you want (to do) that?' She said 'Yes!' He said 'I shall be with you. Stay here, in the bed in which your brother slept, until morning, then go after him'. He said 'Your brother slept here, in that bed.' (69) He placed under her the blankets that Gozali had slept on and she also spent the night there. Just as her brother did, she rose before dawn had broken and quickly hastened on her way. She arose even before her brother had. She said to that old man 'Goodbye!' He said 'God be with you. Go! God willing, the way will be good'. (70) She rode off on the horse, the white horse of hers, the opposite of the black one of her brother. She rode hard, until she arrived and saw the mountain from afar. She said 'It is this one! It seems (from what I have been told) it is a high mountain in the countryside. She reached it and saw Gozali turned to stone. (71) She went around him and wept, she went around and wept, went around and wept. She kissed him twenty times, on his eyes, and kissed him on his cheek (this side) and on his cheek (that side). She wept until she was sated (with weeping), since she thought that also she would turn to stone. She was the last person. She wept and stood by his side. She stood by his side and looked at the cave on high. Now she is about to call out.

(72) She said 'Surely they are not better than Gozali, my brother!'. His golden hair, shining so much, even when turned to stone is still golden. She said 'I'll call still more.' She stopped, then left her brother and directed her attention to Bəlbəl Hazar. She called 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar!' At first she looked at the legs of her horse, she did not look into the cave. She looked at the legs of her horse, nothing had happened. (73) She said 'The old man said to me "On the first cry you will turn to stone, up to the knees of the horse". Now my horse is fine. There is nothing the matter with it. What is going on?'[23] She was surprised. Her mind was confused, she did not know what was happening, whether she would now turn to stone or not turn to stone. (74) The first cry was without any consequence.[24] She did not become stone. She said 'I'll see (what will happen) when I call the second time'. She called: 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar!' She looked at the legs of her horse, nothing had happened. Nothing had happened. She looks at the cave, but there is no Bəlbəl Hazar, she is not coming. Now, Bəlbəl Hazar is not coming and the legs of her horse are not turning to stone. What is going on? She said 'I have another cry. The old man said "You will cry out three cries". Come on, either you will have an answer, or you will turn to stone, or Bəlbəl Hazar will come'. (75) Then she said, she said to herself[25] 'I shall cry the third cry, perhaps all of me in one go will turn to stone'. She thought like that. She did not believe (Bəlbəl Hazar would come). She said 'I just have to stay with my brother'. This brother of mine has turned to stone, I also must turn to stone.' She wants this more, she does not want Bəlbəl Hazar to come. She said 'I'll see, I'll cry the third cry and see what happens'. (76) She called 'Ho, Bəlbəl Hazar!' and Bəlbəl Hazar flew from there, she came out of the cave, she had acquired some wings, like those of birds. She went round above the mountain, above the cave in a circuit, like this, and went down, head first, and thud, sat behind Nozali, on the back of her horse, her white horse. She turned to look behind her and saw her. (77) She said 'Oh Bəlbəl Hazar, you have come! She said 'Yes, I have come'. She said 'Will you not tell me why you have come?' These many princes, these young men, these people have all come to seek your hand. Were you not satisfied with all of them? I am a woman, like you. Why do you come now? Why do you come to me?'

(78) She said 'I shall tell you my secret. Nobody knew it before'. She said 'What is your secret?' She said 'I know the story of you and your brother, and of the king and the son of the king. I know their story. I have sworn, that is taken an oath by God, I have taken an oath that however many men in the world may come after me I shall not go to any man. But, if a woman comes to take me to anyone she wants, or to her brother, I shall go'. (79) She said 'This is my word. Now, you have come. You are the first woman to come. I know that your brother is by your side'. She said 'Well, I shall take you to the son of the king'. She said 'My condition is this. What do you want from me? Now, what do you want from me?' (80) She said 'I want you to make my brother (alive) again and return his breath to him, make him become a man again, so that I can take him away, then we shall decide whose wife you will be. There, you can marry anybody you like. Let us see what the circumstances of the king are, what the king says. We are under the administration of the king. We cannot deviate from his laws.' (81) She said 'Also this (decision) is wise'. Bəlbəl Hazar said 'When I bring your brother back and make him a man again for you, it would be a great shame for me to leave all these other young men stone'. She said 'I shall bring them all back, I shall bring them back. But I, you and your brother, we three have a bond together. These other ones, each will go to his home'. (82) She said 'If you do that, it would be very good for all those people, for their families, so that everybody will hear that Bəlbəl Hazar is a very good woman'. She said 'Go ahead!' What did she do? She prayed once to God and stretched her hand to heaven. She said 'Oh God, give spirit to these people who have become stone, give them spirit so that they will once again become men'. (83) Now, God is great and her request was great also. God heard her voice. As she said, a spirit entered the stones and they became men. All the army returned and became men once again. When they had become men, they were all shouting at one another. (84) One said 'It was I who brought Bəlbəl Hazar, (since) they saw that Bəlbəl Hazar was there. Everybody who said 'It was I who brought Bəlbəl Hazar', what did she do (to him)? She raised her hand over all of them and said 'None of you talk, but listen to me!' They all listened. She said 'None of you should say "I brought Bəlbəl Hazar". Bəlbəl Hazar was brought by somebody who was not a man, but a girl. She is here, Nozali, the sister of Gozali. (85) I did not come at the word of this Gozali. She is his sister. I came at the word of his sister. I have taken her (with me). You all go home. But, you are all invited to the house of the king, in which Gozali and Nozali are staying. We shall go and visit his son and we shall make his son get better. We shall decide there what the future of Gozali and Nozali will be.'

(86) All the others were silent. What could they say? This was her decision. Everybody obeyed it. She said 'All of you (follow) behind us and we shall go to the house of the king.' The army (went along), Gozali and Nozali, on horseback, with Bəlbəl Hazar with them. It became a big party. They rode in the countryside and went along. (87) They came to the place where the angel met them. God once again sent the angel and he came down. The angel knew what was happening there. God, praise be upon his name, knows what happens. Yes, it was their decision. Now he (the angel) said 'Ah!' The old man came. They both greeted him and kissed him on this side and on that. They said 'You did a lot of good and you instructed us'. (88) He said 'Nozali, it is good that you went. I know how Bəlbəl Hazar came. She came by your word. May God be with you and with your brother. I think, furthermore, that the son of the king will be cured. There your story and that of your brother will reach its end, but your lawful right will not be lost. In your childhood, indeed, you were supposed to disappear by the command of the king, but the king will watch you take his place. Go! May God be with you'.

(89) Now, they went off. They left the old man there. They shook his hand and went off. In short, they arrived near to the town of the king and people who had seen them in the countryside went up to give the good news to the king. They said 'King, may you be well. A large army has come to visit you, that is to see you, to make a visit to you and your son. Make a big feast. They are many people. They are many people.' (90) The king was shaken. He went out into the countryside and made towards them. The countryside was full of horses and an army was coming towards his house. Now, the king made a reception. His family and his relatives came down. Nozali was first, Bəlbəl Hazar behind and Gozali behind her, with all the army behind them. (91) The king said 'I ask you, Nozali, tell me, what is it? What is this procession of yours? I sent you and Gozali. These people—what is this?' She said 'I cannot tell you anything. Bəlbəl Hazar will tell you. You sent (us) and wanted Bəlbəl Hazar'. She said 'Don't you want Bəlbəl Hazar?' He said 'Yes. I want her'. (92) She said 'She will tell you. You must do as she says. If you do not do it, you are lost'. She said 'Bəlbəl Hazar can do so, by God's command she will obliterate you'. She said 'She told me to tell you this. Ask (her) yourself and she will tell you'. (93) The king turned round and went and stood before Bəlbəl Hazar. He said 'Bəlbəl Hazar. I am the king. All I request from you is to give a cure to my son. My son is dying. Whatever you decide, so be it. Tell me what this is all about. I do not understand this. All these people have come'.

She said 'However many people came, however many princes and young men came, I did not come, and I would not come'. Even when you sent Gozali himself, I did not come. I had sworn to the Lord God that only if a woman came after me would I go'. (95) She said 'Nozali came and I came by the word of Nozali. I said to Nozali that I would only marry her brother Gozali. But, if you agree for me to marry Gozali, your son will be cured and will get up (off his sickbed). Nozali and Gozali, however, will stand in place of your son in this house of yours. You will not say anything to them nor will you turn against them. (96) They will be in this house of yours and they will become kings. From this day kingship will be cut off from your son. Gozali will become king and Bəlbəl Hazar his wife. His sister will be princess, that is a princess in the house, also she. See how it will turn out'. Yes, indeed it came into effect. What could he do? He could no longer do anything. (97) He said 'Only let my son be cured. We shall do everything you want'. She said 'This is God's command. If you do not do the word of God, you will be obliterated.' He signed and authorized it, and so forth, (pledging) that he would never again talk about it, that he would not interfere and that they would become like his children in the house. (98) His son recovers. His son recovered and after three days there was a wedding. They married Bəlbəl Hazar to Gozali. There was a big party, as my father-in-law Warda used to say. There was singing, lelyana songs, rawe songs, the songs of Muḥammad ʿArif. There was not a song that they did not sing. They sang all the songs and made a beautiful wedding. We say, as my father-in-law Warda said, I have left it there and come here.

A9   The Scorpion and the Snake

Informant: Yuwarəš Xošăba Kena (Dure)

(1) There was a man, who went to plough. He ploughed a little, then his son became sleepy and he laid him down to sleep. There was some water flowing, a channel. He took him there. He went to sleep by that channel while the other one (his father) was ploughing. Then he came back and he saw that on the farther side of the channel there was a frog. (2) From one side the frog jumped to the other side of the channel. It stood still and a scorpion mounted onto its back. It mounted its back and it (the frog) took it across to this side of the water so that it came here. The son of that man was sleeping here. The scorpion got down from the back of the frog and went underneath the pillow of the child. (3) His father, the father of the boy, took a stone and said 'I'll kill that scorpion right now. This frog has brought the scorpion from the other side of the water. It has brought it here to bite my son, my son will die. I shall kill that scorpion.' Then he refrained. (4) He said 'Praise be your name, oh God, if you will that my son die by this means, that you make this frog into a boat to go from the other side of the channel and take a scorpion on its back, bringing it to this side, for it to bite my son that he should die, let it be as you wish[1] oh God, it is your will.' (5) He threw away the stone and did not kill the scorpion. He went off and continued to plough. Half an hour, an hour later, he was not comfortable. He said 'My son is already dead. The scorpion has bitten him'. He went and stopped the oxen, which were ploughing. He took his son and said 'I'll take his coffin and carry him home'. (6) He put his hand on his son, his son was awake.[2] He said 'Ah, father, what do you want?' He said 'I don't want anything. I have finished. Let's go home. He looked under the head of the boy. There was a snake's hole. A snake had come out of there wanting to bite the son of that peasant. The scorpion had come to the opening of the hole and killed it, it killed the snake. He said 'If I had killed that scorpion, that snake would have killed my son'. He took his son and went home.

A10   I Am Worth the Same as a Blind Wolf

Informant: Yuwarəš Xošăba Kena (Dure)

(1) I am worth the same as a blind wolf—What is the story? A shepherd used to go to look after sheep. Every day one of his sheep was lost. One day he looked and said 'Let me see where these sheep are going, why are they disappearing'. He went up to a place on a hill. He set up an observation point for his sheep. He saw one sheep running up the mountain. (2) He went up after him. He went up and up. The sheep entered a cave. There was a blind wolf there, blind. It slept in front of that wolf. The wolf started eating the sheep, and ate it up. He came inside and saw the wolf eating his sheep. He wanted to kill him. (3) Then he refrained and said 'Praise be the name of God', he said 'This wolf has not come down among my sheep. This sheep of mine has come and run to the mountain of its own accord. It went to sleep before this wolf and it is now eating it.' He stood and thought, he said 'Oh Lord God', he said 'That wolf has neither worked, nor cultivated, nor harvested, but you are giving it its sustenance and it is eating it. I also shall go down and sleep at home. You will be obliged to give me my sustenance'. (4) He went down to his home. His wife said 'Where are the sheep, husband?' He said 'The sheep are in the mountains. If you want, go and gather them up!' There was a window in the roof. He slept opposite that window. He put his bed there. His wife went up to bring back his sheep. One day, two, three, he just slept. (5) She said 'Husband! Go and look after the sheep! What shall we eat? What shall we drink?' He said 'I am worth as much as that blind wolf'. One day she asked saying 'What is this story about the blind wolf?' He said 'Our sheep—such a blind wolf is sleeping in the mountains. Every day one of our sheep would run up to that wolf and he would eat it. I am worth as much as that blind wolf. Until God gives me my sustenance through this window, I shall sleep here.' (6) The woman could not keep the sheep. She sold the sheep. They became poor. Everyday she would go to the mountains and bring a load of wood on her back. She would sell it and buy a loaf of bread, half for her husband and half for her, and they would eat. (7) One day she went up the mountain and her foot went down into a hole. She took away her foot and there was a pot of gold coins. She found gold coins under her leg. She said 'By God, He has provided the sustenance of this husband (of mine), who said that I am worth as much as that blind wolf.' She took some of the gold coins and went down to her husband.

(8) She said 'Get up, husband'. He said 'What is it?' She said 'God has provided your sustenance. Let's go up and fetch it'. He said 'No, that is not my sustenance. My sustenance will come down through this window'. She tried (to persuade him by saying) 'Husband! Don't be mad. Get up, God has provided your sustenance'. He said 'That is not my sustenance'. (9) She went to their neighbour. She said 'Neighbour', she said 'I went up to such-and-such a place and in a certain place I have found gold coins like this, a pot of gold coins. He (my husband) says "It is not my sustenance unless God puts it through this window"'. Let's go up and fetch it, half will be for us and half for you'. They went up to that place. That man saw those gold coins. They were truly gold coins. (10) He seized the leg and hand of that woman and bound them. He threw her to the ground. He took the gold coins and took them down to his home. He went down and on the way saw that they were becoming hornets, all flying around him. 'That she-ass! These gold coins are now those hornets. Let me show your husband. I'll go up and put them in that window. I'll shake them all over him and they will go down there (in the house), while he is sleeping in that room. They will sting him and he will die. You will then be free of him.' (11) He went up onto the roof. He placed the pot, the container, on the window. He shook it. Everything that fell down under the beams became gold and fell down onto the floor. That which remained above remained hornets. He went on his way. Then, he went up and untied the legs of that woman. (12) She said 'Neighbour, why did you do this to me? I did you a favour by showing you the gold. You bound my legs and hands and left me here'. He said 'Neighbour, a woman is rather weak'. He said 'I said (to myself, I'll do this) so that you do not go down and say "I have found gold coins and the neighbour has taken them", and so that people would not know things, and the matter would be made known to the government and they would take these gold coins from us. I have taken the gold coins down and deposited them with your husband. Let's go down and divide them'. (13) She got up. He released her feet and hands and he went down to his home. He went down to his home (and he said) 'Go, your husband is now dead'. She said 'Why is he dead?' He said 'They were not gold coins. They were all hornets. I shook them in the room of your husband. Now your husband is dead'. She went up to open the door and saw her husband sorting the gold coins! Those (hornets) that had fallen below had all become gold. So, God provided the sustenance of that man. The story tells that He (God) considered him worth more than the wolf that ate his sheep.

(1) There was a certain Xano the Golden Hand.[1] In origin he was a gypsy. He was a great warrior and very strong. A lion once attacked him. He killed the lion, but the lion ate his hand. The king heard about him and said 'That man has killed a lion'. (2) He sent for him and said 'Let's see how you killed that lion'. He said 'I cannot tell you how. If I tell you, you will faint'. He said 'No, tell me! How did you kill the lion?' He said 'Are you not afraid?' He said 'I am not afraid'. (3) He shouted a mighty shout. The king fainted and fell. The king got up and said 'You shall become my servant. You shall remain with me'. He made his hand out of gold and they called him Xano the Golden Hand. (4) He remained with the king, as the servant of the king. One day they went out hunting. They went to a place and the king fell asleep. He (Xano) was a singer with a pipe. He put his pipe down on a can of yoghurt. (5) A fly came out of the nose of the king, (went) across the pipe that was over the yoghurt, and entered a pile of stones. Xano saw the fly come out of the nose of the king and was astonished. He waited and then he saw the fly come back out of the pile of stones and go back into the nose of the king. (6) The king woke up. The king woke up, tired and afraid. He (Xano) said 'Why are you afraid? What is the matter with you king—may you be well?' He said 'What is the matter with me?' He said 'I had a very frightening dream'. He said 'What dream? How was it? I hope it was good.' (7) He said 'In my dream I went across a great sea, a white sea. There were two poplars (forming) a bridge'. He said 'I went over the bridge, in great fear that I would fall into the sea. From there I went into a cave, a mountain. I saw a treasure of gold, (immense) without end, the gold of the entire world was there.' (8) He said 'I returned and went back over the (poplar) beams, across the sea and was afraid like this until I leapt across to this side and I woke up (as you see me) now. (9) He told the dream to Xano the Golden Hand. He said (to himself) 'By God, there must be something in this place where it entered'. He saw where the fly had entered. Before leaving, he left a (tobacco) bag of his there—he used to smoke pipe tobacco. He put it down there. They went on a little then he said 'King, may you be well, I have forgotten my tobacco bag in some place or other. I shall go to fetch it, then come back'.

(10) He came and made a sign in that place, the place where the fly had entered. Then he went to the king. He stayed with the king and said 'King, may you be well, some time has gone by and I would like to request something from you'. He said 'What?' He said 'Allow me to build myself a house in a place (the size of) an ox skin'. (11) He said 'Go and build for yourself in a place (the size of) two ox skins'. He said 'No, only one ox skin, I shall build for myself a house in a place (the size of) one ox skin. It is a pity for me (that I have not such a house)'. He said 'Go and build this house of yours'. (12) He went off to that place. He went and brought and a very large ox skin. He took it to one of those people who make shoelaces. He said 'Make it for me thus, make this skin a fine (thread) so that it will go through the eye of a needle'. He did this for him and he gave him money. He went to the place. (13) The place (enclosed by) the ox skin covered a great area, since he had made it into a fine thread. In that place he began to build (the fortress of) Dəmdəma, to build Dəmdəma. He dug there and gold was discovered. He brought builders and built the wall of Dəmdəma—that wall remains even now. He built the wall and put lead into it, so that, even if it was hit by artillery, it would not be destroyed. (14) He went on building Dəmdəma and drew water from the mountain, bringing it under the ground and directing it into Dəmdəma. Then he recruited an army, recruiting people for an army. But (he did not accept) any man. He brought valiant men. He would shave their beard dry from here, moving (the knife) upwards. He did not take anybody who went 'ih!'[2] He would said 'You are not a good man'. (15) He recruited an army for himself. People went to the king. They said 'King, may you be well. That man is doing such-and-such'. He said 'What could he do? I have given him the space of an ox skin to build a house'. They said 'But he has built Dəmdəma and he is recruiting an army'. (16) He rebelled against the king. Then there was a war between him and the army of the king of Iran. It was a very fierce war. Yet by no means could the king enter to capture Dəmdəma, so well had he (Xano) fortified it, and, moreover, he had water, there was an army, he had food, he had money, he had everything. (17) But the daughter of that Xano the Golden Hand, who had built Dəmdəma, loved the son of the king. She wrote a letter and sent it by a messenger. She said 'By no means will you capture Dəmdəma unless you cut off the water of Dəmdəma'. She wrote in the letter where the water spring was, from where (the water) came.

(18) When the son of the king had read the letter, he said 'Good!' They went up and dug and cut off the water from the water spring of Dəmdəma. The people were without water. Without water they could not live. Then they made a request from the Lord God, they all knelt and made a request, and (as a consequence) rain fell. They kept the water in tanks and the like, until their water ran out again. (19) Finally, they surrendered it and the king entered Dəmdəma. He entered, but the mother of Xano the Golden Hand was sitting in the door of the palace, with a pipe from here to there, with a burning coal in its bowl. (20) He said 'What dog have you given birth to? The war, he sheds this blood, after the goodness that I did to him'. She said 'He is not a dog. You are a dog'. She said this to the king. (21) She moved the burning coal that was in the pipe like this and it fell. At that time there was gunpowder underneath that place. Dəmdəma burst into flames. She blew up and killed all the people.

(1) There was a king who had forty sons. His youngest son was forty years old. He went to his father and said 'I am forty years old. If each year you marry off one of these forty brothers of mine, I'll be eighty years old (before I marry). I want to marry'. He said 'By God, my son, you are right. I shall go now to see whether I can find forty women so that I can marry you all off together'. (2) He set off and made inquiries. People said that there was a man with forty daughters. He went to another country, found that man and met him. He said 'Fine (I agree). I shall give my forty daughters to your forty sons, but when you come here to seek their hands in marriage, you must not sleep in an orchard, in a meadow or in a palace. If you fulfil these (conditions), I shall give them to you'. (3) His youngest son was called Barzəkko. He said 'My son Barzəkko, you will be the leader of this thing. Go on your way, but the father of these girls has said that you must not sleep in a meadow, in an orchard or in a palace'. He said 'Fine, father'. (4) They set off and, when the sun was setting, they came to rest in a meadow, in which there were mules and the like, and there was a spring of water. They said 'Where could we find a better place than this? We shall sleep here'. They all slept. That young man became their guard. (5) Suddenly he saw a man, somebody dressed in black, his horse black, with his spear, which he had put between the ears of the mare and was also black. He came and rode around those people. He came up to him and said 'Barzəkko, you should leave them, I am now going to make them all fried meat, that is I shall kill them'. 'Oh, for God's sake, don't do that' and so forth. 'They are my brothers, my relatives'. He said 'I am telling you, leave this place, (leave) them. I shall kill them all. You have no business with them'. (6) He ran off to the mountain and he ran up after him. The man went into a cave. He had brothers there and a mother. He said 'Get ready, we are going down'. They were giants. There were thirty giants in a cave. He said 'Get ready, we are going down. Some people have set up camp in the meadow. Let's go down, kill them and eat them. They are enough for us for one year'. (7) What did Barzəkko do? He was standing at the entrance of the cave. As they went out, he (lunged) a sword into the belly of each one who went outside the cave. The mother of the giants said to the youngest son 'My son, bring me also a thigh of a horse for me to eat. Perhaps those brothers of yours will not bring it'. As he went out, he killed also him. Barzəkko went in attacking her, the mother of the giants. He said 'I shall bring you the thigh of a pig'. He killed also her.

(8) He went down. He had a servant. He handed over his horse to the servant. He entered his tent and slept until morning. In the morning they got up and all wanted to go, but Barzəkko was sleeping. They said 'Wake up Barzəkko! For how long will he sleep?' They woke him at day break and went on their way. (9) They went a long way and arrived at an orchard. It was a large orchard. There were grapes in it, springs of water, and the like, everything. Another man arrived. They all went to sleep. Barzəkko became the guard. Another man came, dressed in red clothing, with a red horse, a red spear. In the night his spear was giving off sparks, so powerful was that man. (10) 'Go away from these people. You are famous[1] (so I shall not kill you)'. He tried to dissuade him by begging him 'Man, these are my brothers' and so forth. 'I'm telling you, you take yourself away. I shall finish off all of these people here'. Now, he fought also him. He and that man fought. They continued fighting until dawn. At dawn, the break of day, the man disappeared. Barzəkko went and slept. (11) The next day they set off and on the third day's stage (of the journey) they arrived at the palace. They arrived at the palace and he said 'By God, my father-in-law said do not sleep here and also there (in the orchard and meadow). His brothers—the elder one—Barzəkko tried (to persuade them saying) 'Let's not sleep in this palace. Let's sleep outside. My father-in-law said such-and-such'. (12) They said 'What have you seen in the meadow and the orchard that (you fear) to see here? We shall sleep here'. He said 'Fine. Sleep!' They slept there. While they all slept, he stood guard. In the morning a man came, with a white horse, a white spear and all his clothes were white. He came and said 'Barzəkko, we have heard the news about your reputation. Go out of this palace. I am going to make it a desert.' (13) He tried to dissuade him by begging him, and so forth, but he did not (agree). He (Barzəkko) struck him with his sword and he (the other) said 'What have you struck on my back?' He (Barzəkko) said 'Nothing, a rosary has hit your back'. He struck his head with a sword and nothing (happened). He tried but he could not prevail against him in any way. (14) Then he said 'Look, I'll tell you something. Make your demands. I'll do for you whatever you want. Just let us go to complete this task'. He said 'My demand is that you go and bring back Čəlkǎze Bǎdal Sahare. Bring her back for her to be my wife, then I shall release you and you can all go. But you have to promise, otherwise I shall kill all of you'.

(15) He said 'I promise. Let us come and go here. I shall not go home from this palace, but shall bring for you Čəlkăze Bădal Sahare, a girl called Čəlkăze, forty tresses. It is Kurdish. As for Bădal Sahare, this means the star of dawn. This was the name of that girl, so beautiful was she.

(16) He went to his father-in-law and he said to him 'Have you fulfilled my conditions? Have you all fulfilled them?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'No. You have not fulfilled them'. He said 'You slept in the meadow. And what did you see?'—Sorry, I have forgotten about the ears of the giants. He cut them off and put them in his saddle-bag.—He said 'You slept in the orchard. What did you see?' (17) The eldest son said 'We saw nothing?' The other brothers said 'We saw nothing'. He said 'I shall not give my daughters to you.' The youngest brother came and said 'Yes, you are right. We came and laid down (our loads) in the meadow. (18) Then a man came towards us. I went to expostulate with him, but that did not work. He ran up the mountain and I went up after him. There were giants in a cave. They came out. I killed every one that came out. I entered attacking even their mother and killed her. These are their ears'. He threw them in front of him. (19) He said 'You are right. That is one thing. Where did you sleep on the second day?' He said 'We slept in the orchard'. He said to those brothers of his 'What did you see?' They said 'We did not see anything'. He (the youngest brother) said 'What do you mean, we did see (something)!' He said 'A man came, on a red horse, all dressed in red. We fought from evening until morning. I could not prevail against him. In the morning he ran away. At day-break he disappeared'. (20) He said 'You are right about also that'. He said 'What did you see in the palace?' He said 'In the palace a man came. He was a vagabond, I do not know what they call him, a vagabond'. He said 'I tried to persuade him to leave us, but he did not go'. He said 'I struck a sword on his back and he said "What did you strike on my back", (Barzəkko said) "A rosary has hit you". I struck my spear into him (and he said) "What has hit me?" Every time (I gave him) an excuse'. (21) He said 'In the end I said "What are your demands? I shall fulfil them for you". He said "My demand is that you should go and bring back Čəlkăze Bădal Sahare. She is beyond seven seas. If you bring her here, I shall let you go. If not, I shall not let you go"' (22) He said 'You are right.' He gave his daughters to those people for the sake of that young brother. He went to the orchard etc, and the palace. That man had made the palace ten times (bigger than) before. He made a beautiful guesthouse, with armchairs, carpets, food, everything.

(31) She said 'I shall burn you in the sun, from the fire of the sky, the sun'. He said 'I shall go down under your belly'. She said 'I shall take you down into the depth of the seas'. He said 'I shall sit on your back'. He continued like this, until she submitted to him. (32) She said 'What do you want?' He said 'Take me to the palace of Čəlkăze Bădal Sahare'. So, she flew and took him to that place. She saw a palace and it was spinning, as he had said. There were seven corners on it. On each corner there was a dove. He had a bow and arrow (typical) of that time, is that not so? He shot one, twang, and hit it. Another one came round. The palace stopped. (33) This Čəlkăze Bădal Sahare knew that he was coming. She had sent her brothers to the mountain hunting 'Go off hunting!', since she also wanted to marry, poor soul. He went up towards her and she said 'Quickly, quickly, so that my brothers do not catch you'. She came with him. 'Where to?' His mare of the seas was ready. He sat on the back of the mare, put her behind him and (they went) across the seas. (34) Now, the stones told her brothers that he had take Čəlkăze. The trees said to her brothers that he had taken Čəlkăze. They ran home and found that the palace was empty. They looked at the sea and saw the mare of the seas taking away Čəlkăze. They said 'Go, you have taken her. Let her be permitted to you. You have taken her with your own force'. (35) They went back and conceded her.[3] She said 'Where are you taking me?' He said 'I am not taking you for myself. I am taking you for this vagabond'. She said 'Any man is forbidden to me except you'. She said 'Any man is forbidden to me except you'. He said 'Well, this is the story'. She said 'You take me there. I'll make a plan. Let's see if we can kill this man. What should we do? We shall kill him'. (36) He said 'I have tried. I have tried to strike him. I struck a spear on his head, but it did nothing. I lunged a sword into him, but that did nothing'. She said 'Leave him to me. I'll deal with him'. He took her on the way and they arrived at the palace. The vagabond had gone out to hunt. He came back with a tree on his shoulder, full of wildlife,[4] including wolves, foxes and rabbits. When he killed them, he put them (on the tree) and brought them home. (37) He was a demon. He was happy to receive them. He showed them extraordinary respect. They remained two days there. He and the woman, that is Čəlkăze and the young man, made an agreement. She said 'Don't go and leave me, young man'. She said 'I shall find out where his strength is, and how we can prevail over him so that we can finish him off, then I shall come with you'.

(38) Now, she became the wife of that vagabond. Every day she came with a pretext (to ask him) 'Where is your strength? Where is your spirit? How do you live?', I don't know what (else she asked), she is woman! Everyday he would say 'One day (I shall tell you)'. (39) One day he said 'My strength is in this broom'. She took the broom and put it in the fire, but nothing happened. She said 'No, you have mocked me'. Your strength is not in that broom'. The next day he came and said 'My strength is in another piece of wood. The next day she took that piece of wood and burnt it, but nothing (happened). (40) She said 'Look, I'll tell you. You are mocking me. You don't trust me. I am your wife. If you do not reveal to me in what your spirit lies and how you live, I shall not stay with you a single day longer'. He said 'Look, I'll tell you. My spirit is in a wild ox, in its chest there is a box. In that box there is a sparrow'. (41) He said 'That sparrow is my spirit. They must not kill that wild ox and take that sparrow. If ever that sparrow dies, then I shall die'. He said 'That wild ox, moreover, will not die, unless three arrows of a bow and arrow are produced from the anvil of Egypt. Three arrows produced from it—by this it will die'. (42) He went away and the young man whom she loved came. He said 'So, what is the story?' She said 'By God, the story is this'. She said 'This anvil of Egypt will not split'. He said 'I shall split it'. She said 'How?' She twisted off one of her hair locks and said 'Go for three days until you make an agreement with that man. (43) Say to him "I shall work over this anvil until it splits. If it splits, you will produce three arrows and bows from it. If I do not split it, I shall work over it for free". She said 'Every day work over it from morning until evening. Twist this lock of hair like this. Don't worry, go and sleep'. (44) He went off and made inquiries, and found that anvil of Egypt. He made a contract with him (the owner). He said 'I shall (work) over this for free. If I split it, you will produce for me three arrows from it. If I do not split it, I shall work over it for free'. He said 'Man, you are wronging yourself. Who can break it?' He said 'By God, it is so. If I split it, you will give me three arrows and a bow. If not, nothing'. He said 'Fine. Get to work!' (45) He worked every day every day, from morning until evening. In the evening he rubbed the lock of Čəlkăze on the anvil and went away. One day, the second day, the third day, in the morning, in the early morning, he heard a bang—it was split. He went (to look). He got up in the morning and went (to look) and saw that it was split. Then the owner of the anvil of Egypt made three arrows from that anvil of Egypt. He (Bazəkko) then returned.

(46) The vagabond used to go to the mountains in the day and come back at night. He (Barzəkko) went to Čəlkăze in the day-time. He said 'I've come back and here are the three arrows of a bow'. She said 'Look, in this mountain there is a spring of water. This wild ox once a day goes down to the spring of water and drinks water. Go and lay down a woolen mat. Take some tar'. (47) She said 'Put it in the water and put the tar on it. The water will stop flowing, the water will not come out. Put some wine further along'. She said 'This ox will come and see that there is no water. It will smell the odour of the wine and not drink. It will go to the mountain, then come back again. In the end it will be forced to drink and will become drunk from the wine. It will come to sleep'. (48) She said 'At that time, strike it with those arrows and a bow. You will kill it and it will die. Slaughter it and open up its chest. The box, a box like this' She said 'take it from his chest and bring it to me'. (49) He went and took them, together with wine to that place. He saw the spring. He pressed it down, put down tar, the woolen mat and tar. The water stopped flowing. He put some wine further up from them. He positioned himself. He dug a place to hide. He hid. Then that wild ox came to drink water. (50) It did not find water. It went and sniffed, and smelt the odour of wine. It did not drink it. It went again to the mountain. It was thirsty and came back again, but again did not drink. The third time it drank. It drank and felt dizzy. It became drunk. That man (Barzəkko) was waiting in ambush there. He struck it with three arrows of a bow and it fell. (51) He went and slaughtered it, opened its chest and found a box, small like this. He took it, brought it back and gave it to Čəlkăze, to the woman whom he had brought. He said 'Čəlkăze, here it is'. She said 'Thank you very much'. (52) When he struck the wild ox, that vagabond felt it and shivered. He was like this, as if he were ill. He came back home ill. She said 'Ah, what is the matter with you?' He said 'I don't know. I don't know what has happened to that wild ox, whether it has fallen on a rock, whether a thing such as that has happened to him. I don't know what is going on. Now I am very ill'. He said 'I have never been ill like this'. (53) He laid down a bed and went to sleep. She opened the box and said 'Here is a sparrow'. She seized it and moved its shoulder like this, he also shook his shoulder. She pulled apart its head and its shoulder and threw everything down. At the same time he also died. Her husband (to be) came back, the one who had brought her. She notified him and he came back to the house. He took her and he remained there for some time. He took her and went home.

(54) He went to the home of his father. His father was a king. There was a battle in the town, a remarkable event. He had put his (Barzəkko's) wife in a certain place. There was a house (there). He went and said 'What is happening? What is happening?' (55) They said 'By God, this king had a son. He brought back his wife. When they went and brought back forty wives, he brought back his wife. The king loves his daughter-in-law, the wife of his son. The wife of his son does not accept him. Those forty wives are all sisters and are against this thing. The king is confounded and says "I must marry this girl". (56) He sends people to the palace. Every day they fight (attempting) to seize the girl, seize the girl and bring her to marry the king, his father. His father wants her to marry (him)'. His father was the king. (57) Now, he went off and became a servant of the king. He changed his clothes and became a servant of the king, giving water to the horses. Every day they would go out to fight. 'What is happening?' He (a bystander) said '(They are going) to the palace', in which there were forty girls, her sisters. He said 'What is in the palace?' (58) He said 'By God, there are forty girls, the daughters-in-law of the king. The husband of a young girl among them has gone out into the world and the king wants to marry her. They are protesting against him'. He said 'Well, cannot all these people who are going (to fight) prevail against the forty girls? Everyday an army of riders on the back of horses goes (to fight), horseman. Cannot they prevail against forty girls? I am going to bring her'. (59) Word reaches the king. Word reaches the king, he (a courtier) said 'King, may you be in good health, the servant who gives water to the horses has said "I shall go and take her"'. He said 'Send for him and let him come'. He went and he said 'What do you want?' 'King, may you be in good health, in all there are forty girls here, they are women, how is it that you cannot prevail against them? I shall go.' 'Give him a horse. Let him go tomorrow morning'. (60) The next day he took a horse, sat on its back and went off. 'Hey, I am so-and-so, come on, come out! Whoever wants to fight with me, let him fight with me'. They started saying to one another 'Sister, a man has come out, he is shouting saying "Whoever wants to come and fight with me, let him come and fight with me"'. (61) One girl went out. She said 'I shall go out'. She went out and fought and fought, morning and evening. He did not want to strike. In the evening, at sunset, she ran away and entered the palace. He struck his sword on the neck of the horse on whose back he had come and killed it. He went to the king. He said 'King, may you be in good health, what kind of horse did you give me?'

(62) He said 'What do you want?' 'Give me a good horse and I shall seize those girls'. He said 'Fine'. He said 'There is a horse that for these five years nobody has been able to get near'. Then he (Barzəkko) said 'What horse is it? Where is it?' He said 'It is in such-and-such a place, in such-and-such a house'. He said 'We even give food to it through the window'. (63) He (Barzəkko) said 'King, may you be in good health, give it to me, I shall go up (and ride it), surely it will not eat me, surely it is not a lion. It is a horse, not a lion. He (the king) said 'This is the key. Off you go'[5] He knows it, (since it is) his own horse. He knows where his own horse is. He said 'I don't know where that house is. Send a man with me'. (64) He sent a man. He said 'Go, show him'. Now, when they went up and arrived, he said 'Look, there it is. That door is the one of the horse'. He went up and opened the door of the horse, the door of a basement stable. The horse came moving his ears like this, intending to strike him. (65) He put his hand like this on the snout of the horse. He said 'Poor creature, don't you know me anymore? Although I have been away in the world for these five years, don't you know me any more?' Now, the horse stood still, he knew he was his master. The horse stood still. He cleaned his horse. The poor thing had been there for so long, without being groomed or cleaned, nothing. He put a saddle on it. (66) In the morning he sat on its back and went out. The horse had not seen the sun for so long and it flew off. He went down and made a circuit around the palace. He said 'Hey, come here! Yesterday I came and fought with you. I have come also today. Not one of you, don't come out one by one. Five, six, ten come out. All of you come out!' (67) His own wife was the youngest. She said to her sisters 'My sister, I shall go out'. She went out. Then she fought in the reception room, she and her husband. The poor thing did not know that he was her husband. She fought and struck. She struck and he defended himself, she struck and he defended himself, until sunset. (68) At sunset she ran off intending to enter the palace. His horse was strong. He held the door fast. He held the door fast and lifted up his hair. He said 'You fool, don't you know me? Don't you know my horse?' Then she shouted to her sisters. She said 'Come! He is my husband. He is my husband'.

(1) There were once two kings, brothers. One was in Babylon and one in Nineveh. The one in Babylon missed his brother in Nineveh. He said 'Let's go up and meet my brother in Nineveh'. They said 'That's fine'.[1] They went off. (2) The queen, when the king left the house, held a party. Everybody gathered there. The queen said that whoever danced with her would sleep with her. Her husband went up to Nineveh, then returned home. (3) After some time, after a few years, the king of Nineveh said 'I shall go down and meet my brother in Babylon'. So, he went down and met him. He said 'Brother, tomorrow let's go hunting and have a good time, for fun'. His brother from Nineveh said 'Brother, I am tired. I cannot go out today. My leg hurts. I shall stay at home.' (4) As for the others, the king announced that they would go hunting, so they went off around (the countryside) on a hunt. The wife of the king did what she had done the day before. She held a party. She said that whoever danced with her would sleep with her. (5) The brother of the king saw this, but they did not see him. He was sitting in a place where he saw them but they did not see him. His brother came back and he said 'Brother, I thought that only I was wronged, but you are more wronged than me'. He said 'What is it brother?' He said 'The situation is like this'. (6) He stood up in disbelief. The next day he said 'Brother, I do not believe it'. On the third day he said 'Say again "I am going hunting" and hide yourself elsewhere. Come here, in the place where I am sitting, in the porch. Watch what happens'. (7) On the third day his brother, the one from Babylon, again made an announcement to the people saying 'Let's go hunting'. They went out, they all went hunting, but the king hid somewhere else. He came to his brother and sat on a balcony, where they did not see him. Nobody knew about him, it was a secret. (8) Now, the queen came out and again the same thing (happened). She and her servants all danced and sang together. She slept with a black slave. He saw her and said 'Have you seen, brother? Don't say that I am being deceitful to you. Look what your wife is doing'. (9) He drew his sword and both of them killed all those (present). The king and his brother killed all the slaves and the wife. He said 'Brother, let's go out into the world. If we find that there are people more wronged than us, we shall return. If there are none more wronged than us, we shall continue on our way.

Then, they saw in the sea, they saw a plume of smoke come out of the sea and go up into the sky. A demon came out, came out of the sea, holding a box like this on his shoulders. He came to that tree. (11) They ran and climbed the tree out of fear. He put the box on one side.[2] There were seven locks on that box. He opened, one, two, three, four, then a girl came out, but what a girl! She was of a unique beauty.[3] She came out and he said 'Sing and dance', then the girl sang—the demon said to her—she started dancing and singing, dancing and singing. (12) Then she sat on the shore of the sea. He put his head on her thigh. She looked thus into the tree and saw those two men there. The demon was asleep. She took his head and put it on the ground. She said 'Come down!' She said 'If you don't come down, I shall wake this demon and he will kill you'. (13) So, they came down (and said) 'What do you want?' She said 'Give me your rings'. They took off their rings. She took out a chain. There were four hundred and fifty rings on that chain. She put also these (on it). She said 'Come and do (as I say)'. (14) They tried (to remonstrate) in this way and that, but she said 'He will come and eat you'. She said 'Look, I was engaged to my cousin. The day I would have got married, this demon came and stole me away. (Travelling) in this box together with this demon, I have slept with four hundred and fifty men. If (you) do not (sleep with me), I shall wake him and he will eat you'. (15) They were forced (to submit). They also went with her and slept with her. Then she woke the demon. He said 'What do you want?' She said 'Make me fly up into the sky'. He held her like this with his hand and made her fly into the sky and they flew off. (16) He said 'Brother, we are not the only ones that are wronged', said one of them to the other. 'We are not the only ones that are wronged. This demon is more wronged than us'. They said 'This demon—look this woman in the box with seven locks has slept with four hundred men. He is more wronged (than us). Come, let us return to Iraq. They got up and returned to Iraq. (1) A king would marry a girl everyday. In the morning he would get up and kill her. The minister searched and searched, but the girls had run out. Every day (he had killed) one and there were no more. The minister had a daughter. That daughter said to the minister, to her father, she said 'Father, take me, I shall marry this king and rid you of this business'. (2) She went off. She had a cat and she took it with her. She took the cat with her and married the king. He slept and she began to tell a story to the cat. (3) She said to the cat, she said 'Kitty, the night is long, I shall tell a story. Then, in the morning, the king will get up and kill me, since whenever he marries (a girl), he marries her in the evening and kills her in the morning. I know that the king will kill me in the morning.

(4) She said: There was, was there not, there was nothing greater than God—this story was (told) to the cat—there was a woman, who had a son called Karimaddin. Now, the father of this Karim died. (After) his father died, everyday the woman would beg to feed her son. (5) She sent her son to school. Her son everyday in school would beat one child, take the bag of another, tear things. They sent for his mother and said 'Talk to this son of yours and teach him not to behave like this. (6) If he continues with this bad behaviour,[1] we shall expel him from the school. He is annoying the children of the school'. She tried (to stop him and said) 'Son, don't do such a thing'. But they expelled him from the school.

(7) He remained in the neighbourhood. Every day in the neighbourhood he would steal the chicken of one person, then go (and steal) the fruit of another. He wrought havoc in the neighbourhood. He burnt the neighbourhood, so delinquent was he. (8) They said 'That boy is an orphan. Should we beat him? He does not have a father. What shall we do with him?' There was a man who was clever. He called him and said 'Karim!' He said 'What?' Karimaddin said 'What?' (9) He said 'We shall buy a donkey for you. Come with us every day to the mountains to gather wood and sell it for your mother. Everyday you will make a living by a bundle of wood'. He said 'Why not?' He said 'This is a good deal, by God'.

(10) The people of the neighbourhood collected money and bought a donkey. They arranged a cloth on the back of the donkey and gave him an axe. They took him with them everyday up into the mountains. They would take him up into the mountains and he made one or two loads of wood. Then he would come back and sell them for himself and his mother. They would eat bread by this wood.

(11) One day they went out from the village and went up into the mountains. They arrived at some mountain caves, or the like.[2] There was heavy rain, a lot of rain. What did they do? They all went into a cave. They said 'Let the rain stop'. They entered a cave. (12) The young boy, poor thing, took the axe with him, the axe, and went into another cave. He sat like this, striking the axe, and a lid appeared, a handle, a piece of iron, a large stone with an iron handle on it. (13) He ran to those people (saying) 'Come! Come! I have found a treasure'. Now look (how stupid he was telling others)! They said 'This Karimaddin wants to trick us even here. What treasure have you found?' He said 'Come and see'. They went and saw that it was true, there was a stone like this, with a handle of iron in it. (14) They applied force and eventually removed it, revealing a conduit, full to the brim with honey, full to the brim with honey'. They said 'So, Karimaddin, what shall we do?' They all (said) 'What shall we do?' He said 'Let's go down and fetch water-skins'. He said 'Let's go down and sell this honey and make some money, then divide it among ourselves'. (15) All day they continue to draw out that honey, until evening. In the evening two men went down and, as they were coming up again, they said 'Why are we so happy about this honey? Karim will go down and say "I found this honey, it is mine". We shall receive wages from him'. (16) The other said 'It is easy. This Karim has no father and has no mother. We shall say "Come Karim, go down into this conduit. Take out the honey that is left". Then we shall go down and share the money among us'. He said 'When he goes down there, we shall throw the rope onto his head and shall put this cover over the opening of the cave. Then we shall take down to his mother this donkey blanket'. (17) He said 'We shall daub the donkey blanket with blood and say "Karim went after his donkey, to fetch his donkey, and wolves came into a valley and ate him and his donkey. We did not find anything except these. We found only these clothes of his"'.

We shall go down (the mountain) when we have made good money and we shall share it among ourselves in fellowship'. (19) The poor young boy did not know what (was happening). He said 'All right, all right'. He went down into the conduit. He put all the honey that was left into the skins and they pulled them up. They said 'Is it finished?' He said 'It is finished'. (20) They said 'Stay where you are' and they threw the rope onto his head. They pulled the stone over him then put some manure over it, sheep's manure. They went and killed the donkey. The jacket of the Karimaddin had remained outside. They daubed it in blood and the like, then went down to his mother, went down, sad, to her house. (21) They went down and his mother came. She waited and waited, but her son did not come. She went (and asked) 'Where is he, for God's sake?! Where is my son?!' They said 'Well, we wanted to come back, but we could not come back to tell you. Your son's donkey went into a valley and your son went to fetch it. (22) Wolves came and attacked him and his donkey and ate him. We only found this sign of him'. The poor woman began to beat (herself) and put ash on her head. Her son had gone! They divided the money among them and went on their way.

(23) Now what[3] should I tell you about? I shall tell you about Karimaddin. The poor Karimaddin went down into that thing. He said 'Oh Lord God', he said complaining to God 'Oh God, why was I born? You have taken my father (and I am) an orphan. I did not tell you to show me a treasure, but you showed this treasure to me. You have put me in this hole, but what have I done? I did not do evil or good to anybody'. (24) He was only a young boy. He sat there thinking. The poor thing became hungry. He ate some of the honey. He became thirsty for water, but there was not a drop of water. He remained there until the morning. Day came and he was still searching about, when he saw a small ray of light. (25) He said 'By God, there is a small chink of light here. It must be something'. (He was) a young boy, you see, and he had a knife with him, (and had also) the axe. He scraped the honey with the knife, digging, digging and digging. He came out into a corridor. He said 'I am finished[4] (so I have nothing to lose). I shall go along this corridor and see where it leads to'.

(26) He went a long way along the corridor and came to a door. He came to a door and saw that the door was of wood and had a lock of silver with a silver key on it. It was not gold. He opened it and he came out into another world, with a blue sun and a blue land. (27) He said 'Oh Lord God, what is this? I'm finished'. He went along—how thirsty he was, poor boy—and saw blueness. He went down and saw a tree. He ran to the tree and saw some water there. He sat down and drank the water, washed his face and prayed to his God. The young boy, poor thing, went to sleep there. (28) He went to sleep, then woke up and said 'I'll just walk and let's see where I come to'. As he was going along he suddenly saw from afar something white in the blueness. He went and came close to it. He saw a very large palace. He went and knocked on the door. There was nobody. (29) He said 'By God, I'm done for,[5] so I shall go in and see what there is there'. He went in and saw that all kinds of food were cooked and made ready there and warm, but nobody was there. He served it out and ate. He went into another room, a large one, with some chairs on one side and some on the other, and a sofa placed over there. They were all decorated with precious stones (inlaid) in them. (30) He approached and sat there, then went to sleep. He went to sleep, then woke up, but what (a surprise when) he woke! There were snakes, each bigger than the other[6] with its mouth open towards him. He said 'Your name be praised, God!' His heart burst (in fear). (31) Then he saw a snake come, as if flying. He heard its voice, it came and entered through the door. He saw a gold tray on which there was a small snake with the head of a man and the body of a snake. One of the large snakes went and took the tray and brought it. He came up and put it next to Karimaddin. He went and delivered it and sat down again. (32) The snake said to Karimaddin 'Karimaddin, welcome! Today you are my guest. Do not be afraid. Sit and rest'. The poor boy sat down and felt comfortable. They brought food and so forth. He sat down and ate everything in one go.

(33) She (the queen of the snakes)[7] said 'Karimaddin, tell me your story. From where have you come here and how have you come?' Queen, may you be well, my story is very long. I cannot tell you all of it'. She said 'The night is long. Tell me your story. How did you come here?'

She said 'Even me—this head of mine will be cut off by your hands'. He said 'How could it be that I shall cut off your head?' (35) She said 'I say that this head of mine will one day be cut off by your hands. You will cut off my head. I said 'Queen, may you be well, queen of the snakes'. Sit down and I shall tell you a story then'. She said 'I also want to tell you a story of mine'.

(36) He said 'Please go ahead, queen'. The story goes: There was, was there not—she said—there was a king of Yemen. He had a son who was an only child. He and his son together with two ministers went out hunting. They went out hunting, they went along for a while and then they saw a gazelle on the plain. They ran after the gazelle. (37) The gazelle ran and ran and ran. It went down to the shore of the sea. There was a small boat there. It went into that boat. Then they arrived there, by the shore of the sea. The son of the king went down. The son of the king and the two ministers went down to catch the gazelle (and take it) from that small boat. (38) But suddenly the boat sailed off. It went into the sea. They travelled and travelled and travelled, they sailed on the sea. They remained with it. They caught the gazelle and slaughtered it. They were hungry. They ate it, they ate the meat and drank the water of the sea. The boat went along and reached another island, then came to rest. (39) It was a very beautiful island, with trees and the like in it. It came to rest on the shore of the island. Then they got up and alighted from the boat. They tied their boat there to a tree. They said 'Let us go into the interior'. (40) The son of the king said to the ministers 'Go into the island and see what you can see'. They went off for a short while then returned. They came back and said 'We are afraid. We dare not enter (the island)'. They said 'You also come with us'. (41) He also got up and the three of them went and entered the island. They went and walked around for a long time but did not see a single person. The island contained all the fruits of the world. They went along and then, from afar, they saw something white. (42) They came near to it and (saw that) it was a house, a very beautiful palace.—She said 'Are you listening Karimaddin?' He said 'Yes'. She said—They went into that palace. They went in and saw food, tables, everything arranged, but there was nobody.

(43) Now, they ate and drank, the son of the king sitting on the throne, one minister sitting on a chair and one on another chair, then they went to sleep, since they were very tired. Then they woke up, but what (a surprise when) they woke up, there was the sound of monkeys crying, wailing, as monkeys do, jumping on the trees, playing. (44) He looked and saw that thousands of monkeys had appeared there. The ministers drew their sword as well as their bow and arrow, intending to strike the monkeys. He said 'You may kill one, you may kill two, but what will we do with (all the rest of) them? If we fight with them they will kill us'. He said 'Wait and let's see what happens'. (45) Then a large monkey came, one of those big gorillas. It came and opened the door. It came in and went up to the king[9] and bowed to the king. It said 'King, may you be well, you have now become our king, the king of the monkeys'. He said 'How have I become the king of the monkeys?' (46) 'It is as King Solomon has written'. It said 'King Solomon wrote and said "Whichever person[10] comes to the island first, he will be your king"'. Now you are our king. Give us an order for us to celebrate'. Now, there was no sleep until dawn. There was dancing, eating and drinking. 'Announce to the monkeys that they may do whatever they want'. (47) He gave word to the monkeys and then they became very happy. They remained there. 'What shall we do? What shall we do?' The king said to the monkey, the leader of the monkeys, he said 'I want to see my land, (to see) how big my country is. He said 'I want to go around my land to see it'. (48) The next day he gathered the monkeys together and toured around. They arrived at a mountain and he saw dead wolves and monkeys there. He said 'What are these?' He (the monkey) said 'Our border is here. From here to yonder mountain is the land of the wolves'. (49) He said 'There is constant warfare between us and these wolves'. He (the king's son) said 'Now, when you go up, where is the border of the monkeys?' He said 'The border of the monkeys is the top of the mountain there. There King Solomon has written a monument'. (50) He said 'From here onwards is the valley of the ants'. He said 'Everything that enters this valley will be eaten by the ants'. He said 'If you go onwards from there, you will reach a river, except that it dries up on Saturdays. Every Saturday there is no water in the river. On the other side of the river there is a village of Jews'. It (the monument) said 'This road goes as far as there'. He said 'Fine. He toured about and came back in the evening'.

(51) He spoke with his ministers and said 'By this road we shall escape from here'. They said 'How?' He said 'I shall tell these monkeys to gather together. We and these wolves shall fight. We shall fight with the wolves and reach the top of the mountain. We shall reach the top of the mountain and the valley of the ants'. (52) He said 'We shall go into that valley. Then we (shall take) our chance. If the ants eat us, they eat us. If we escape, we escape'. The next day he called the leader of the monkeys and said 'I want to attack these wolves'. He said 'How?' He said 'I see that they are eating and killing the monkeys, my people, is that not so? Let us fight them and I shall take the land from them'. (53) He said 'Give notice to the monkeys and let all our forces come here'. He gave notice to the monkeys and the monkeys gathered in thousands.—Who is telling this? The queen of the snakes to Karimaddin. She said 'Are you listening Karimaddin? He said 'Yes'.—(54) Now, the forces of the monkeys came the next day and they set off. Also the king (of the monkeys, that is) the son of the king and his ministers took their sword together with their bow and arrow and set out to fight the monkeys. They fought and fought and blood flowed into the valleys. (55) After a time the wolves were defeated. After they had defeated them, they went up into the mountain. They found there an inscribed monument, which King Solomon had written: 'Thus far is the land of the wolves. From here onwards is the valley of the ants. Every man who enters, every living creature that enters in this valley will be eaten by the ants'. (56) He said 'Fine'. He called the leader of the monkeys. He said 'Let everybody sleep. You all sleep and we shall be the guards, since you are very tired'. All the monkeys slept, then they got up and stole away and went into the valley of the ants.

(57) After a while the monkeys woke up, but they (the others) were not there. They called their leader and said 'They are not here, they have fled'. He said 'Follow after them! Wherever you find them, kill them!' The monkeys went into the valley of the ants. The ants began fighting, some large ants that were there. (58) One of the ministers was eaten by the ants, one minister. The son of the king and one minister remained. They went along and arrived at the river. It was not Saturday and it was flowing in force. They threw themselves into the river. The other minister disappeared in the water and was drowned. Only the son of the king escaped. The son of the king escaped to the other side of the river. He went along slowly and entered the village.

(59) He knocked on a door and (the occupier of the house) spoke to him and said 'What do you want? Where have you come from? What is (your) story?' He said 'By God, my story is very long. If you look after me, I shall become a servant in your house'. He said 'Fine'. He went in. He said 'It is Sabbath'. He said 'The food is over there. If you want to eat, eat! You are hungry. Drink some water. I shall not touch anything'. This is because Jews on the Saturday do not work. (60) Now he was hungry, the poor man. He put out some food and ate. He sat down. Evening came and he said 'Now, tell me, tell me what your story is'. He said 'By God, I am the son of the king of Yemen. My story is such-and-such'. (61) 'Ah', he said 'the merchants of your father have just departed from here, from this village. The merchants of your father come here every three years'. He said 'Stay with me here and I shall look after you until the merchants of your father come here again and I can hand you over to your father, because your father is a good man, he is our friend'. (62) The young man was happy. He (the Jew) said 'You shall not do anything. Every day go out and wander about and then in the evening come back home'. Every day he went out and wandered about in the village, for one day, two, three.

(63) One day he heard a man 'Hey, who will become my servant, from morning until evening, for twenty-four hours? Let him come and I shall give him one hundred gold coins and at night I shall give him also a woman, a maidservant'. He said 'By God, that is a good deal!' From morning until evening (for a hundred gold coins)—a hundred gold coins at that time were indeed not a small amount. (64) He went and said 'I shall be (your servant)'. He saw him and said 'No, it is a pity for you (to do so), you are a young man. I do not want (to accept). Go and ask your father'. He said 'What is the matter with you? I shall become (your servant)'. 'Take those hundred gold coins to your father and come here'. (65) He took the gold coins and went back to the man with whom he was staying. He said 'Well, do not ask me about those hundred gold coins (that I have brought). I shall go and come back in the evening'. He said 'Don't go, man. He will eventually destroy you'. He said 'I shall go'.

(66) He went up to that man and evening (came). Morning came. He got up in the morning. He said 'I say to you this: you must do everything that I tell you'. He said 'Fine'. He took a horse. He took another knife with him and went off. He went a long way (and came) to some very high mountains.

(67) He said 'Get off the back of your horse!' He got off 'Kill the horse!' He killed the horse. He said 'Cut it from here downwards and throw away its neck, throw it away'. He said 'Go into its torso, into the chest of this horse and sew it from inside. However much you hear a taq-taq-taq (noise), do not come out, until I say to you "Come out!", then you come out'. (68) He said 'Fine'. So, he went down into that thing. It became rather hot during the day, then some birds known as simarxa came. They struck the chest of the horse (with their beaks). They took it up to the top of the mountain in order to eat it there. They continually made a taq-taq knocking noise, taq-taq, once, then twice, then he became fed up. (69) He struck the knife into the skin that he had sewn from inside and came out. When he came out, the simarxa bird flew away. He realized that it had taken him onto the mountain. There was no road down. (70) Then, the merchant who had given him money said 'Throw me the stones that are there, then I shall show you the way down. If not, you will remain there, you will stay there and die like those who have already died there'. (71) He said 'Wander around there and you will see the bones of people who have died there. You also will die there'. He wandered around and saw the bones of people who had died there. He said 'By God, he was right'. (72) He began to throw some of the stones from the mountain, they were all diamonds. He threw and threw until evening. In the evening the merchant brought other people, servants, with him. They carried all those stones home and left him there.

(73) He remained there and said 'What shall I do? What shall I do? Where can I go? There is no road, there is nothing'. It became dark and he slept there that night. The next day he got up and again wandered around. He said 'I also shall remain here and die like these people have died'. (74) He struck into the mountain and went off saying 'Let's see where I can go, where I shall come out'.—She said 'Are you listening Karimaddin? He said 'Yes'—Now, he went off, until he came to the mountain. He went a long way until he came across a small hut, a small house. (75) Now, he made his way towards that house and knocked at the door. An old man came out, with a white beard. He saw him and said 'Hey, man, how have you come here? From where have you come here?' He said 'By God, old man, my story is very long. Let me come in. Give me some water to drink, I am dying of hunger. May God give you (it in return). If you look after me and take pity on me, God will take pity on you'.

(76) He said 'Yes, my son, yes my son, come into the house'. He brought water and he drank it. He gave him food and he ate it. He stayed with him. He told all his story to the old man. He said 'What can I do for you? I myself am confused. I do not know where I am, I do not know where I am, nor do I know where I have come from'. (77) He stayed there, one day, two, three. Now, there was a pool of water in front of the house. When that old man went down to clean around it, he went down to help the old man. He said 'What is that?' He said 'I want to plant around it some flowers'. (78) He said 'In Spring some people come and swim in it'. He said 'Who are those people? What are they?' He said 'I like you so I shall tell you'. He said 'Three daughters of a king, from Qaṣr Hozər—it is called Qaṣr Hozər—put on the clothes of doves and come and sit on that tree. They go down and bathe in this water'. (79) He said 'Real girls?'[11] He said 'Yes'. Now, everyday he would go down and plant flowers and water them. He looked after it (the pool) very well. The old man looked at him and saw that he was a very conscientious young man. He said 'Since you have been doing such things, should I tell you what to do?' He said 'What?' (80) He said 'You go and sit over there. They will go down and take off their doves' clothes. See which one you like and take the clothes (belonging to her) and bring them to me, and all will be fine'. (81) He went down. Every day he went down—he had made a place to hide in. One day he went down and heard (something) and saw that three doves had alighted there. They went down and settled on the ground. They slipped off their clothes and he saw (that they were) humans, who were talking. (82) He noticed that the young one was very beautiful. They went down to swim. With a swift movement, he stole the clothes of the young one and ran. They began shouting 'Hey man, hey man!'. He went to that old man. (83) They put on their clothes and went to him, to that old man. They said 'Dear old man, what is it? From where have you brought him here?' He said 'There is nothing the matter. There is nothing the matter. Now, he loves this young girl. If you promise to marry him, he will give back the clothes. If not, he will still give you the clothes, if you want them'. (84) He went and brought the clothes and gave her clothes to her. They remained there with him. They went there for three days, but stayed three months, so much did they enjoy themselves with that young man.

(85) In the end, the old timer said to them 'Your father is waiting for you now. He thinks you are lost. Go back to your father, then afterwards this sister of yours will come back (here)'. So, they went off to Qaṣr Hozǝr, to their father, the king. (86) She (the young girl) said 'The story is this. There is a young man. I have given him a promise and I must marry him, I must return there'. He said 'My daughter, that's fine. Go back!' She put on those clothes of hers. He sent also some people to protect her, like eagles, but they were people wearing feathers. (87) She went there. She stayed with him for some time. Then, one day, he went up onto the roof, a very high place. Sadness came upon him. He remembered the house of his father and his family. He fell and fainted. They searched for him but did not find him. (88) Then they came across him and found that he had fainted and fallen. She asked him saying 'Why? What is your story? Why are you like this?' He said 'By God, you do not see me (as I really am). I also am the son of a king and he is waiting for me to return. When my father dies, I shall be king in his place. Now I am lying here and I do not know where I am'. (89) She said 'It's all right'. She said 'I shall put on those doves' clothes and tie you to my back, then fly off and take you to the land of your father, so long as you know the land, and do not take me to another strange land and make problems for us'. (90) She said 'Do you know it? If we go to the land of your father, will you recognize it?' He said 'Of course I shall recognize the land of my father. How could I not recognize it?'

(91) She put on her clothes. They said to the old man 'Farewell. We are going'. They kissed the old man, bid him farewell and she flew off. She travelled for one day, two days and then became tired and descended and rested somewhere. On the third or fourth day, as she was flying, he said 'Stop, stop here. This is our land'. (92) Where was it that he saw? He saw where he had sat in that small boat. (It was the place) in that boat, but there were guards of the king who were posted there. He (the king) said 'You must find my son, perhaps he has drowned, perhaps his body has gone out into the sea. If somebody brings you word about my son—whoever brings me word about my son, whether he is dead or alive, I'll give him half of my gold'. (93) It is the king who is saying this. He (the king's son) said 'Stop, stop. Go down here. They went down there. Then they (the guards) looked and saw that the son of the king had come and that a girl was with him. The one who saw him ran, he had to tell the king. (94) Another said 'What is going on?' He said 'The son of the king has come'. While he was running the other took a kilo of gold in his hands and hit him (with it) on his head. He fell and the other ran off. They tried (to find out) what it was, but he did not reveal anything.

(95) He came to the king and said 'King, your son has come'. The king fell down. He fainted, poor man, on account of his joy. Then he woke up again. His son had come back! He ran out to meet his son, together with a drum and pipe, since his son, the son of the king, had been lost for some time. (96) He had brought a girl with him and he was very happy with that girl. He said to his son 'How have you come?' He said 'By God, my story is very long but she is the one to thank. She had these clothes with which she flew and carried me on her back, and so on, and so on, and we came here'. (97) He went and called the girl. He said 'Come, you are now the queen. Tell me anything you want in the world and I shall do it for you'. She said 'I do not want anything. I shall live like you.[12] Only, build me a'—all their homes were tents, (they were) Arabs—she said 'Build me a house, a tower, in the way that I like'. He said 'Fine'. He built a tower for her.

(98) The young man, the son of the king thought and said 'Perhaps a day will come when that girl will be angry with me, put on those clothes of hers and fly back to her father's house. Who will take me there? How shall I know where she is?' (99) What did he do? He put her clothes in a box and placed it in the foundations of the house, then built a wall over it. She did not know, she was innocent, poor thing. After the house was finished, she went to find her clothes, but her clothes were not there. (100) She could smell the scent of the clothes, she could smell it. She looked around for her clothes, but did not find them. Now, one day she went down into the basement. The scent of her clothes came to her. She said 'They are there'. She searched and searched and searched for them. She knew where they were. (101) She dug and brought out the box of clothes. One day she put on her clothes, flew up and sat on the roof. She called to her husband saying 'I loved you and followed you, while not knowing that you would turn out to be treacherous to me, that you would put my clothes in the wall and build the wall over them. (102) If you love me, you now can follow me. I am going to my father's home. Our home, the name of our palace is Qaṣr Hozər. If you love me, go there. He tried (to supplicate with her) and beat his head, but she went off.

(1) There was once a monk who lived in a cave. A horseman, a rider came. He alighted at a spring. He sat down, ate something and drank some water. He had some money. He took it and put it on top of the spring. He forgot his money. He went off. He went off on the road. (2) Another rider came, a horseman. He went to the spring. He saw the hundred dinars. He quickly took them, put them in his pocket and went off. The first (rider) said 'Oh, I have forgotten my money. I'll return and go to take my money from on top of the spring.' (3) Before the first man reached the spring, an old man came. He went up to the spring, laid down his load and sat down to rest. The first man, who had forgotten his money, came to him. He said 'Give back[1] my money! I have forgotten one hundred dinars here. You must give it (to me).' 'I have not seen any money'. (He could) not (find it) here and there, he tried (looking) on the other side, but no. (4) He said 'I'll kill you'. He said 'Kill (me). I have not got it. I have not seen any money'. He killed him. He killed him. Do you know what a monk is? A monk is somebody who worships God, who prays and does not eat meat. He is called a monk. He was dwelling in a cave for forty years. (5) He arose and said 'If (the world) is like that, I shall go and search for what is lawful and what is unlawful, for what is lawful and what is not lawful'. So, he went down to set off on the road. God sent an angel to him. (6) He said 'Go down to meet this man, the monk, so that he does not make a mistake'. He went down to meet him. He said 'Hey, my soul,[2] where are you going?' He said 'I am going to search for what is lawful and what is unlawful'. He said 'I also am going to search for what is lawful and what is unlawful'. (7) He said, the angel said to the monk, he said 'Will you do as I say, whatever I tell you?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'Fine'. He said 'You and I are brothers'. They went a long way until they came to a village. It was evening, this time of day,[3] they knocked on the door of a person. They entered the house. (8) 'Greetings to you!' 'You are welcome, please sit down'. They sat there, ate food, then slept. They slept. In the night the angel woke the monk. He said 'Get up! Get up!' He said 'Oh, let us sleep'. 'Did you not say "I shall do as I say"? Get up and take this knife. Go and slaughter this baby boy who is in the cradle'.

(9) He said 'How can I slaughter him? What is lawful and what is unlawful?' He said 'Did you not say "I shall do as you say". That is that. Whether you want to do so or not, go and slaughter the baby.' The father and mother of the baby did not have children for fifty years. God gave this baby to them six months ago'. (10) They slaughtered him and went on their way. At night they went off, and went up to another village. He said 'What is there lawful or unlawful in this, my brother? You should teach me what is lawful and what is unlawful'. They went to another village. Then, when they had gone up to that village, they entered a house. (11) They (the inhabitants) laid food to eat. They brought a golden bowl. They placed it there, with water in it. They ate the food, but did not drink the water from that bowl. In the night the angel woke the monk, he said 'Get up! Take this bowl and come with me'. (12) They took the bowl in the night, took it away and threw it into a house enclosure. They took it from that enclosure, took it away and threw it into another one. He said 'What is lawful or unlawful in this? What is the difference (whether it is) in this enclosure or that one?' He said 'Come, come with me. Did I not say to you "Do everything I tell you"?' He said 'Yes'. (13) Then they went up into a mountain, a mountain with high rocks. An old man, whose age... that is his beard reached the ground, was carrying a load of wood on his back. He was sitting on a stone, like this. They passed by him, but did not even greet him. The angel said to the monk, he said 'Look how fit he is! Go and kick his back on the load (he is carrying) and let him go down (the mountain) and break his neck.' (14) He said 'What is there lawful or unlawful (in this)?' I shall not do what is unlawful.' He said 'Have you not promised me?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'Go on!' He went and kicked him, and he went down (the mountain) and broke his neck'. He said 'Why this, my brother? Why have you done this to me? I am seeking what is lawful and what is unlawful to God, and so forth, but why have you ruined me today[4] and done such a thing to me?' (15) He said 'What did you see before your eyes?' He said 'I saw, when I had sat there for forty years, had sat in that cave, that a horseman came, he came to a spring. He ate something. He left his money there and went off. Another man came. He took that money and went off. An old man came. The first man returned and killed that old man. Why?'

When God gave them a son, they began to forget God, they did not remember God and did not pray to God. They were constantly attached to their son. No, he told us to take their son so that they remember God again.' He said 'Fine, I now accept that. What about the meaning of that golden bowl, which we took from here and took away to that house enclosure?' (18) He said 'That house was pure, but the bowl was stolen. The enclosure where you threw it, they are all robbers there. God will judge them. May they get what they deserve'.[5] He said 'Fine, but why did you make me kill that old man?' (19) 'That old man was very good and went in the way of God. He had not committed any (sinful) error. He started to get incapable and tired. In order for him not to commit an error, he said 'Oh God, take me, oh God, while I am like this", before he committed any error. (20) Do you now understand everything that I did before you?' He said 'Yes, I have understood them.' He said 'Go back to your place and continue to serve God as you have served him for forty years. I am an angel. If you do not do as I tell you, I shall take away your life'. (21) He said 'For the sake of God and the Messiah, do not touch me. I shall go to my place. I'll eat my bread (there) and until the day I die I shall always keep to God's way'. I have left it there and come here.

A16 The Monk Who Wanted to Know When He Would Die

Informant: Dawið 'Adam (Dure)

(1) Another monk, a monk, said 'I want to know when I shall die'. He said 'I want to know when I shall die'. He asked, he investigated here and there. He said 'There is somebody in Kirkuk who knows when I shall die. He is a lad called David.' What is the profession of that David? He used to polish shoes and sew shoes. (2) A girl came to have her shoes polished. He saw her leg here. He got up and made his eye blind. He stuck the needle into his eye. He said 'Why should all my body go to the fire, to Hell? Let only my eye, which saw it, go to Hell'. He burst his eye. He became blind David. (3) The monk had heard about that David that if he says he will move a mountain from here, he will move it there, so (devout) a Christian was he, so believing in God. The monk went to Kirkuk. He asked 'Now, where is blind David? Where is his place (of work)?' and so forth. He reached his place. (4) When he arrived, he greeted him, he saw him and greeted him 'Greetings to you!' 'You are welcome!' He said 'Please sit down!' He sat down. He said 'Now, what do you want?' He said 'By God, I have come, since I have some business I'd like to do with you'. He said 'Fine. I'll finish my job, then we shall go up to the house'. (5) So, he worked until the evening. He did the work.[1] People came to him and went away. Before this story that I have told you, the father and mother of blind David pressed him and said 'We must marry you'. He tried to (avoid it), in this way and that (and said) 'I shall not marry. What (good) would marriage be to me? I don't want it. I shall not marry'. (6) They tried (to persuade) him, saying 'You must marry'. He said 'Shall I marry? Will you marry me?' They said 'Yes'. They went to find the girl. They found a girl and brought her. They said 'We shall ask for her to be betrothed to you'. When they brought that girl, when they brought that girl to him, they wedded her (to him). (7) Afterwards he said to her 'I'd like to say something to you'. She said 'Tell me'. He said 'Are you not the girl on account of whom I made myself blind, by puttinng the needle into my eye?' She said 'Yes'.

(9) So, after this the monk came up to visit blind David. He said 'I want to know when I shall die'. He said 'Fine. It is easy'. They ate dinner and finished (the meal), then he made him up a bed. Blind David slept here, the woman slept here and the monk slept here. They had put out a basket of water, they put it in front of their legs. (10) Do you know what a basket of water is? But, can water stay in a basket? He was so (holy), he loved God and God loved him, that he made even water stay in the basket. (11) While they were asleep, the monk put his leg onto the leg of the woman, rrrrr, the water came down onto their heads. He said 'Oh look, what have you done, monk?' He said 'Nothing. A17   THE WISE YOUNG MAN

(1) There was once a man, an elderly man, who was going along the road. He went along for about half an hour, an hour, along the road. A young boy… not young, that is one who was eighteen or twenty years old, followed him. He followed him and saw a dead person, whom they were taking to bury. (2) The youth, who was twenty years old, said to the older man, the older person, he said 'Uncle, is that person dead or alive?' He said 'This and that (curse) be upon you. He is indeed dead. Don't you see that he is dead? They are taking him to bury and you say "Is he alive or dead?". He is indeed dead'. (3) He went along and did not speak. After a while, they came upon a river,[1] water. He said 'Uncle, should we not make a bridge for it so that we can cross over this water?' He cursed him again. He said 'From where should I bring you wood? From where should I bring you nails? From where should I bring you a saw so that I could saw for you the wood to make a bridge, so we can cross it?' He said again 'Fine'. (4) They went up a mountain. He said to him 'Uncle, should we not make for this mountain steps, so that we can go up the mountain?' He said 'Oh, you dog son of a dog, who are another (son of a dog)! Why[2] are you such a trouble to me?' He said 'From where could I bring you a pickaxe, or bring you stones, or bring you cement, so that I could make steps for you to go up?' (5) The youth did not speak. They passed on and went up the mountain. They went up, there was a plain, with a big town there. He had no relatives in that town. The old man said to the youth, he said 'Where will you go?' 'I have nowhere to go. I'll go to the mosque. I'll stay in the mosque.' (6) The elderly man went to his house. He had a daughter. He was rich and had a large residence. His residence was (very) fine. Now, he went into the house and his daughter said 'Oh, father, how was your journey? Was it good? Was it peaceful or not?' (7) He said 'My daughter, I was very peaceful, but a tiresome youth came along and annoyed me'. She said 'What happened?'[3] '(When) we reached the middle of the journey, (we found) a man had died and they were going to bury him. He says "Is he dead or alive?" He was indeed dead, they were going to bury him'.

Eat it!' He opened it and saw that there were six eggs. He opened (the basket of) bread and saw that there were twenty-nine loaves of bread. (13) He said 'I don't want them. Take them!' 'Why (not)?' He said 'A week for us is seven days and a month is thirty days. Is your week six weeks? Is your month twenty-nine days? I don't want them. Take them and go!' He took them and returned them. He took them to his daughter. (14) She said 'Oh father', she said 'I see you have brought them back. Why?' He said 'He says such-and-such has happened. (17) That is, when he said "Is he alone or not? Is he dead or not?", (this is because) a man by himself, who does not have a father, a mother or anybody, they say that he has no relatives. He is dead (in this case). So long as he had a wife, he had sons, he had relatives, he is not dead'. (18) He said 'You are right. But from where could I have made him a bridge?' 'He did not mean "Make me a bridge of wood" and so forth. (Rather his meaning was that) one of you should carry the other, carry him on his back, and he would become a bridge. One of you would get wet and the other would not get wet'. He said 'You are right, also in this'. (19) She said 'On the mountain, when you came to go up the mountain, it was not his intention that you should dig the mountain. He meant that you should tell stories, you should speak with one another, so that the mountain would finish quickly. It was not his intention that you should go and dig the mountain and make him steps, and so forth'. He said 'By God, you are right'. (20) 'Go and tell him to come here'. He went again and told him, and he came. He came to the house. He entered the house and saw it, then said 'This door of yours is crooked'. The father of the girl said 'How can it be crooked? We made it exactly according to a spirit-level, man, but you say that! What (do you mean by saying) it is crooked?! The door is straight, it is not crooked'. And so forth. (21) Afterwards she said—the boy and girl talked with one another—she said 'I love you'. He said 'I also love you'. They married one another. They married one another and the king heard that a young man had come to their home, that he was very clever and that also his wife, whom he had married, was very clever. (22) He gave an instruction to that youth saying 'You have to go to the army'. He said 'You have to go to the army, you must go'. Everybody who comes to my land, must serve in the army'. For what time is this army of his for? For three months. So, he said 'Fine, I'll go'. (23) He knew what his intention was. He constructed a board and made it into a ladder. He put them in the garden. He fetched nails and put all the nails underneath. There was a door in the garden and there was also a main gate. Then he went to the army. (24) The other, the king, came at night. The king came at night and went up through the garden. He went up the steps, he went up and went in (to visit) the girl. He went in (to visit) the girl. He said 'Tonight I shall be a guest in your home'. She said 'Oh king, you are welcome'. (25) She said 'I shall go and bring some drink, nibbles, and so on, so that we can sit and drink, you and me'. She went and quickly brought drink and they sat down. She brought two glasses. For herself she pours out a little and for him a lot. She fills hers all with water. His was continuously full. They drink and finish it.

She locked the door and went to sleep. (27) In the morning, at four o'clock in the morning, the king woke up (and saw) that he was in the bathroom. He did not delay and quickly opened the door, then ran away. He ran and went away. He went away and in the morning the girl got up and cleaned the place, and so forth. (28) After three months the young man came back. (After) the young man came back, he went immediately and saw that on the steps gold had stuck to the nails. While he placed his foot—the shoes of the king were made of gold—he placed them on the nails, the nail ate the gold, took some of the gold. (29) He said 'The king has come here to visit my wife.' He came back and called his father-in-law. He said 'Come. I'll tell you'. He said 'Is everything all right? What is the matter?' He said 'Come. I don't love your daughter'. (30) He said 'Go and tell the king "I had an orchard. I had cultivated it. It was laid out with vines, apple-trees, everything. It was laid out with food. A man came and took away my orchard. He does not return my orchard nor does he pay the price". Go and say this to the king. See what the king replies'. (31) His father-in-law went to the king. When he went to the king, the audience chamber of the king was full of many people. They had all come with cases to present to the king. He sat last (in the queue). He (The king) asked the first one 'Why have you come? What is your case? What has befallen you?' The first one told him (his case), the second one told him, until his turn came. (32) His turn came, he (the king) said 'What is your story?' He said 'King, may you be well. A man has come (to me). He had an orchard. (He said) "I had cultivated it with my hands and toiled greatly in it in order to make it produce its fruit. (33) When its fruit became ripe, a man came and took its fruit. He took my orchard. He is neither returning my orchard nor paying the price of my orchard. I am confused as to what I should do. I cannot do anything. What do you say to me?"' (34) He (the king) said 'I say to you: Yes, it's true. You had an orchard. But a lion entered it and came out as a fox'. Now, when he said that to him, his father-in-law did not understand what the meaning was. The king knew. He came back. He said to the young man, he said 'The king replied to me in this way'. He said 'What did he say?' (35) He said 'It is true. You had an orchard and a person came and took it from you. He did not pay its price nor did he return your orchard. A lion entered the orchard and came out as a fox'. He said 'Did he really say that?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'I from now on love your daughter and shall become a son-in-law in the house. I now know what you mean and what the king means'. Thank you.

A18 Baby Leliθa

Informant: Xošebo 'Odišo ('Ɛn-Nune)

(1) There was a king. He had four sons. The four sons prayed for a sister, a single sister. All they wanted was a single sister. An only sister was born to them. The only sister was a small (baby). She stood up in the cradle, untied her bands, went into the village, ate a child, then came back and went to sleep. (2) Nobody knew about her. They came to complain to the king. King, may you be healthy, what kind of village is this? What kind of guard are you appointing? My son was eaten tonight while asleep in his cradle. How can such a thing happen?' (3) He said 'Go and keep guard'. They went and kept a guard in that far corner, and one in this other corner. Also the next day she got up, the next day she went and did the same. At night she got up, untied her bands, then went and opened the door with a key. She went and ate another child, then came back and went to sleep. (4) They continued to complain but it was still no use. Also the next day, the third day, the same happened. On the fourth day, her young brother, the youngest one, woke up. He watched her, he watched. He said 'This is what is happening!'[1] He stayed still. He saw her, but at first he did not reveal (what he had seen). (5) He said 'I shall see and investigate also tonight. I shall see whether also tonight people come to complain to my father. My father is the king'. Also the next night she got up, at three o'clock in the morning, untied her bands, went and ate another child, then returned and went to sleep. (6) She opened the door and went to sleep in the cradle. She was Leliθa. Nobody knew about her. Leliθa would eat people. They (the parents) did not know. They thought their daughter was a small (baby). They did not know. (7) My dear, also that night they came to complain. He (the young brother) said 'Tomorrow I shall tell my father'. In the morning he got up. (When) the people had gone and finished, he said 'Father, I'd like to tell you something. If you get angry with me, (remember) I am your son. Don't get angry with me. (8) You are are a very respected father, but I am forced (to tell you) that I have seen something before my very eyes that I must tell. It should not happen. We are kings. If we see things happening and do not care for this country, it is not right'. He said 'Go ahead, my son'.

(9) He said 'You must know that this thing that is happening, is happening in our house'. He said 'What are you saying, son?' He said 'By God, father', he said 'I have seen my sister untie the bands, take the key, open the door and go out. She came back, again opened the door, entered, lay down to sleep and tied her bands. The next day people came to complain'. (10) He said 'It is my sister'. He said 'No, you must not say that'. He said 'Father, that is up to you. I am telling you'. He did not believe his son.

(11) He (the son) took himself off and went to live in another town. She ate, she ate all the village. She finished off all the young children. His father and mother and her brothers still did not believe it. One night she ate her father. One night she ate her mother. Nobody knew. She ate everybody. (12) The son who had gone to another town, that is a town, a village, remained watching intently, listening (for news) about his father's family. For many years, four, five six years, he did not go there. He said 'The land of my father, my brothers, my mother and father, are in my thoughts.[2] How are they? I shall go and see what has become of those people'. (13) He set off and sat on the back of his horse. He and his wife made an agreement. They had two sons and a daughter. He said to his wife 'Wife, I shall give to you this ring of mine. I have some lions. If you watch this ring, if the gem of my ring changes (in colour), send the lions so that they come (to me), for I am in trouble'. (14) 'And you', she said to her husband 'I also have two seeds'—she also was the daughter of a king—'Take these two seeds, put them in your pocket. If danger comes near to you, put these two seeds in the ground and two poplar trees will grow up which you can climb and perhaps save your life before the lions arrive'. (15) They told each other (these things). He set off and went on his way. After a day or two he arrived. It was a long way. He arrived at the town of his father. He looked around the village, there were no cocks, no hens, no men, no women, no sound, no young children, nothing. There was no sound. There was no sound of them. (16) He said 'How you have become a ruin!' He said 'I shall just go up to my father's palace, I shall just have a quick look,[3] perhaps I shall find a brother of mine, my sister, a relative or mine'. He still loved his sister. 'She is still our sister'.

(17) He knocked at the door. He prepared himself (for a fight). He took some trousers. He tied a cloth on them and filled them with ash. He tied them up and brought them (with him). He said '(In case) something happens', so that he could find a way out (of trouble), so that, if he had to flee, he could find for himself a way out (of trouble). (18) Look what he will do. He went up and knocked at the door. There was his sister 'Hey my brother!' 'My dear sister!' 'Welcome! Where have you come from? Why have you taken pains (to come)? How have you come?' He said 'Sister, I have come'. (19) Then she ran away. He said '(Only) I and my horse (have come)'. His lions were with his wife. Then she went down into the basement stable. He knew this. She went down into the courtyard and ate the leg of his horse. She ate it and came back up. (20) She said 'Brother, why does it have three legs?' He said 'Sister, I came here, while it had three legs, limping up to here'. He said 'It came to my mind, sister, to come to see you'. (21) She delayed a little, waited, then went down and ate another one. She said 'Brother, that horse, how has it come with two legs!?' He said 'I have indeed come from there to here with two legs (on my horse). You came to my mind'. She went down and ate another one, the third and the fourth. She said 'It is useless'. (22) She began to eat the torso. What did he do, my dear? He took himself off, put something under his feet and went up to an upper window. He tied those trousers of his with some iron. She was still in the basement stable. He fled and ran away. (23) It was full of ash, so that when she comes to eat it, it will go into her eyes and he will manage to escape'. She came in, my dear. She bit⁴ one of his legs and the all the ash fell into her face. He ran away (very fast) with four, five or six (bounds), as we say in Barwar, with four, with five, with six, that is bounds. (24) He fled with one bound, he fled with two, he fled with three. He went off. Afterwards she saw him on the plain. She shouted at him 'Where are you from and where are you going?' He was—pardon me⁵—urinating blood, so scared was he that she would eat him. (25) While his wife was sweeping, she looked at the diamond of the ring and saw that it had changed colour! She said 'Dear me, oh woe to me!'⁶ She went into the courtyard and took out the lions. She said 'Go! You know where your master is'.

They were well trained. (28) This story is like that, as people have told it, so we are telling it. They left a small piece. He said 'She is still my sister'. He put it in his pocket. He kissed the lions, sat on the back of his lions and went off. They had eaten her. (29) He put that piece, the nail of her hand, in his pocket. It became a sparrow, it became a live being, it became a worm and started eating him. It started biting him. He said 'This place here on me has become numb'. (30) It became a small bird, it became a sparrow. It became a worm inside him, like a small snake, reached his heart and ate it'. He put (his hand here) like this and found it was all wet. He said to the lions 'Lick here'. (31) They licked. He said 'Lick her. Eat her so that a even a small piece of her does not remain. I do not like her any more'. He went and sat on the back of the lions and they went home. He arrived home exhausted. (32) His wife said 'Why are you tired?' He said 'Don't ask.[7] I cannot tell the story now, it is very long. (1) Now, there was a Leliθa who came from Č̣āl. She came down to the water-mill of the family of Xammo. A man had a water-mill and his name was Xammo. He had a daughter-in-law. He had sons. She came down and greeted them. She said 'Greetings to you', like a human. She came down and offered greetings and he said 'You are welcome'. (2) She had put a veil on her head, but the daughter-in-law saw her finger-nails, they were the claws of an animal, of a bear. She saw them. She began to talk just as we are speaking. She said 'I am the wife of the aġa of Č̣āl.' Her mother-in-law believed it. Her father-in-law believed it. The son believed it. Everybody believed it. The daughter-in-law, however, did not believe it. She had three sons. (3) At night, the time of sleep, they ate something. At the time of sleep, she (Leliθa) took a bead, a bead of sleep, and put it on the chest of her mother-in-law. Her daughter-in-law realized (what was happening). Her daughter-in-law, in bed, realized this. She got up and took a son (of hers) and took him for her to eat. She put him down far away from the village. (4) What did she do on her return? She closed the door and in the middle of the house she made a fire. People who had mills would always make a fire in the house. She put all the iron bars of the mill into the fire. The Leliθa came. She was all (made of) fat, fat, oil. She came to the door. (5) As she put her hand to open the door, she (the daughter-in-law) struck the iron bar into her hand and burnt it. All the oil ran down from there. She started (to try to) break the door, but she could not. (6) She went up onto the roof. There was a hole. She started to gouge it out and (tried to) come down. Half of her came down but half remained. She (the daughter-in-law) was constantly taking the iron bars and putting them into her, until she killed her. She killed her, and she remained there. (7) She got up in the morning, but did not tell her mother-in-law and father-in-law, and so forth. She went and came to her son. She brought him back. She did not eat the boy. She just took him and put him down. She brought her son back. She brought him in and opened the door. (8) She said to her mother-in-law 'Mother-in-law!' She said 'What is it my dear?' She said 'Come and see the wife of the aġa of Č̣āl. Come and see her. So, she came and looked. She saw Leliθa. She had killed her there. (9) Those things happened at that time, they are true. So, she came and made herself into the wife of the aġa of Č̣āl, but she only spoke (like a woman). You see she was a giant, you see what kind (of creature) she was. I left it there and came here.

A20 THE BEAR AND THE FOX

Informant: Dawið 'Adam (Dure)

(1) One day a bear was wandering around the mountains. She met a fox. The fox said 'Hey, where are you going, my dear bear?' 'By God, I'm looking for my sustenance. Perhaps something will come my way, so that I shall be able to eat something', and so forth. He said 'Don't you know yourself that it is cold. Why are you going from place to place? She said 'No, it is not cold here'. (2) He said 'If you want, I'll weave you a large basket, we call it a basket, a basket for winter, so that you will not get cold, so that the cold will not get to you, so that the snow will not get to you'. She was on a mountain, sitting down. He said 'Come!' (3) He went and brought twigs (and laid them) around her… He said 'Sit inside'. She sat down. He wove them up to here. She said 'Stop!' I (want to) get out of it'. He said 'No, not until I make a lid also for your head, then you come out'. (4) He finished it. He wove it all and the bear remained inside it. He kicked her and she went down (the mountain). She fell and went down, down, down the mountain until the bottom of it, the valley. She went down there and all her bones were broken, she was mutilated. The basket that he had woven was shattered. It was all shattered. (5) What did he do? The fox ran. The fox ran. The fox ran. She (the bear) slowly got up. One, two or three days (later), after she had got better, she went on her way. She went after him. He entered a hole. He entered a rock. There was a small hole (in it). His wife was there also, and the fox had children. (6) The fox entered there and the bear went there. The bear went there and put her paw into it, but it did not fit in, since the hole was small. The fox, however, entered into it. They remained there and the bear went off and brought back a hornets' nest. She brought it and put it before the door of the fox's hole. The hornets flew back and forth, durr, durr, durr. (7) They thought the bear was there and did not dare come out. They remained hungry. They remained hungry and the fox said to his wife. He said 'What shall we do, wife?' He said 'We have three children here and we have (almost) died of hunger. What shall we do?' He said 'What shall we do? Let's slaughter the young one and eat him, (and wait) until the bear goes away from there.

(8) They slaughtered the young one and ate it. The hornets continued flying back and forth, back and forth, back and forth. He said 'Still the bear is not moving from here'. He does not know what is happening.[1] He said 'What shall we do wife?' He said 'What? It is the turn of the second one'. (9) They slaughtered also the second one and ate him. After they had eaten the second one, a week, two weeks went by and they became hungry. They slaughtered also the third one. The hornets were still before the door of the hole. Only the two of them remained. He said 'Wife, now what?' (10) He said 'Now what shall we do? Come on (let's fight and) whoever falls (first) will be eaten'. They attacked each other and the fox fell. She said 'Hey, what do you have to say?' He said 'My foot hit the broom'. They wrestled once again. The fox fell. She said 'What is the matter with you?' She said 'I shall eat you'. He said 'My foot went into the cooking pot'. (11) The third time the wife fell, thump, his mouth was on her neck and he ate her. He ate her and remained there for a while. 'What shall I do'. He said 'Either the bear will eat me or I shall escape. What shall I do? I shall not die here'. (12) He went out and ran, until while running he looked behind him and saw that there was no bear, nothing, (only) hornets there, which had been placed there. He said 'The bear has ruined my house. I have eaten the three children, I have eaten the wife, all because I rolled her (down the hill). I have left it there and come here.

(1) There was a king. He had a daughter, who would just sleep in the house and eat, sleep and eat. She had a big bed. Her servants would bring her food, she would eat then go to sleep. She did not work. She went on (like this) from day to day, day to day, she went on for years. She only knew how to sleep and eat. She became very fat. (2) The king was at his wits end regarding her. Nobody would marry her. He said 'What should I do? I should find a solution for this daughter of mine'. He called to his vizier and said to him 'Come, let's see whether you can help me with any ideas.[1] What should we do to this girl who constantly sleeps, night and day, constantly eats and sleeps, eats and sleeps?' (3) He said 'Let's look for a man who is a hard worker and give her to him. He will look after her'. They made inquiries (and found that) there was a young man. He had only a mother. He did not have a father. He had an ox and an ass. (4) Everyday what was his job? He would take his ox and take his ass early in the morning and go to cultivate (his field). He would then come back home, eat something and go to sleep. (5) They heard about him. They said 'By God, he is a good lad, it seems, let's take her and give her to him'. They set off, he had gone to work, to cultivate (his field). They put her in a car, with all her effects, (the contents) of her room. They put her in a car and took her off. He had one room like this one, it was small, his bed and his mother's, on the floor there was nothing, no chair, nothing. (6) They took the girl and said to the mother of the young man, they said 'We have brought this girl for you, for your son'. She could not speak'. They said 'She is the daughter of the king'. She could not speak a word. What should she do? She said 'Put her on the bed'. (7) They put her on the bed. They brought her bed and laid it down. The house was filled by her bed. They put her on the bed and they also put her effects there. She remained there. (8) The young man came back from his cultivating. He put the oxen in the basement stable. He went up to eat something and saw that his house was full 'Hey', he said 'What is this?' She said 'My son, this is the situation: the king has brought his daughter and said "This daughter of mine is for your son, that is she will become your wife"'.

(9) He said 'What are you saying?' She said 'Yes, by God. That is what the king said. He and his vizier brought her here, and her effects are here'. She was asleep on the bed, very content, and they did not disturb her. (10) He said 'Mother, there is nothing to worry about, she is welcome'. She remained like that. The first night he said to his mother 'Put out for her just a jar of water'. He said 'Put out for her a jar of water by her head and that's all, no food, no bread, nothing. Put out for her only that jar of water by her head and that's all'. (11) She said 'My dear, yes, I'll do as you say'. He got up in the morning. His mother served him tea, served him eggs. He ate and she looked after him. She packed food in his bag—we call it a jarreta ('lunchbox'). She packed the lunchbox, (put) yoghurt in a pot and placed it in his bag. (She also put) seed in his bag. Then he set off. (12) He took the ass and the ox and went off. He began cultivating. He began cultivating (and continued) until evening. In the evening he came home. He rested, went to bathe and entered (the house). At dinner time his mother brought dinner to him and he began to eat. (13) He said 'Mother, who has worked?' She said 'My dear, you have worked, the ass and the ox, and I have attended to the house'. Has anybody (else) worked?' She said 'No'. He said 'Whoever does not work, will not eat'. He (was saying this) for her ears.[2] He said 'Whoever does not work in this house will not eat food. Whoever works will eat'.

(14) Now the next day she did not eat. She (the mother) did not put out food for her. The next day he got up. Again his mother got up and made him breakfast. He ate breakfast and she put everything else into his bag, everything they had, bread, yoghurt, everything they had. He took his ox and went to cultivate. He set off to cultivate. In the evening he came back. (15) He said 'So, mother, what do you say? Who has worked today?' She said 'My dear, only you have worked, the ass and ox, and I have put the house in order'. He said 'Only we shall eat. Whoever has worked will eat. Whoever has not worked should not expect to eat.' (16) He was shouting so that the daughter of the king would hear. She went hungry when the third day came. They went to sleep. Again they got up in the morning. The young man got up and had breakfast, washed his face and went to his work. His work was to cultivate until evening. (17) In the evening he came back. He washed in the bathroom. His mother prepared food and laid it out. As usual he said 'Well, mother, how was today?' She said 'By God, today, we have worked a little'. He said 'So, we'll eat a little'. They ate. Then they took a small container and put it at her head.

(18) There was no speech (with this). He did not speak to her at all. She did not get up. She continued sleeping, thinking that she was in her father's house and that the servants would bring her food. Nobody, however, was bringing her food. They put out a little food. In the night she got up, drank water and ate that food. (19) She thought to herself, she said 'If I go on in this way, I'll die. Should I not get up early to work for myself, so that I can eat? (20) The fourth day, after…the young man had breakfast and went to work, his mother looked after him and he went off to work, she got up and washed the dishes, swept the house and tidied it. (21) The young man came back, he returned and said 'So, mother, who has worked today?' She said 'My dear, we all have worked'. He said 'So, we shall all eat.' They went to the table, as usual. She came and sat down. They began to eat together. (22) The fifth day, she got up instead of her mother-in-law, instead of the mother of the young man. She made food for the young man. He ate. She packed his bag with provisions. She put them in his bag together with seed. (23) She went down with him into the basement stable. She got out the ox and the ass. She set him on the way and he went off, then she came back and went up (to the house). She went up and began working, sweeping, polishing, and so forth. She said to her mother-in-law 'Don't you work. You sit down. I'll work'. (24) She began working, with the girl doing this and that, day after day, day after day. She learnt how to work. She began selling. He said 'I think this girl is a good housewife, but we did not know this about her.'

(25) One day the king said to the vizier 'Let's go and see what has become of that daughter of ours. Perhaps she is dead, perhaps something has happened to her'. He said 'Let's go king'. They set off. Her mother-in-law had gone to visit some relatives who were neighbours. The young man had gone to his work. (26) She was making meat-balls. Her hands were in dough, while kneading the meat-balls. Her father and the vizier came, the two of them came and knocked on the door. They knocked on the door. While there was flour on her hands, she opened the door. She opened the door and saw her father and also the vizier who was with him. (27) 'Hey, daughter, how are you?'[3] She said 'Father, I am well, thank you'. He said 'It seems that your hands are covered (in flour)'. 'I am making food'. 'You are making food?' She said 'Yes father'. 'How she has turned out!' She said 'Yes, I am hard-working. All the work, the work of the house is my duty.[4] It is me who does it'.

(28) She said 'Sit down, I'll make food, one of these big meat-balls. One is for my mother-in-law, one is for my husband. The one that is for me I'll divide into two parts and give one to you and one to the vizier'. (29) He said 'Why, daughter?' She said 'Because this young man (has made a rule that) whoever does not work will not eat, does not have a share in this house. What do you say (to that)?' She said that. 'I shall give my share to you. I shall not eat'. (30) He said 'My daughter, no, no. You eat. We shall go. We shall not stay for lunch'. The king left, cheerful in spirits, together with the vizier and went on their way. They went off and she made meat-balls and fried them in oil. (31) She then served them. Her mother-in-law sat down. She and her mother-in-law ate and she left some food for her husband. Her husband also came back and he ate. He said 'How delicious the food is', and so forth. He began to rejoice.

(32) One day he (the king) said 'This cannot be'. The king said 'This cannot be'. If my daughter has become hard-working and has learnt to work, I want to know what (kind of person) this man is, how could he have made this girl a hard-working housewife, while she is the daughter of the king and is used to sleeping and eating, sleeping and eating. Today she has begun to feed people'. (33) He said 'I must know what the story is'. Now, he sent a message to the young man. He said 'Come, I have business with you'. He was afraid. He was afraid and said 'Ah, see the king will do something to me'. (34) He went and he said to him 'My boy, just tell me, in truth, how have you made this girl a housewife, hard-working, cooking, washing, polishing, sweeping, cooking and doing everything, while in my house (from the day) she was born she has not worked, until today? How did you show her the way to learn this work?' (35) He said 'Was it for this that you sent for me?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'Look king, if you please, I shall now tell you and believe me it is really like this. I shall not give up[5] until the day I die the way I am following now'. (36) He said 'In my opinion[6] whoever does not work in my house has no share and will not eat. Whoever works in my house will eat. If you come now, come to my house and do not work, I shall not give you food. I tested her for three days. (37) I said to my mother "Place only water by her head". For three days water was by her head. She was obliged to stay by herself. My mother would make breakfast for me and food, and I would go. She would look after my animals and I would go to work. She, however, was asleep.

(38) Was I obliged to kill myself working to feed her while she slept? No way. On the third day, after I went to work, she went down (to the basement) to sweep. I said to my mother "Who has worked?" She said "My dear, we have worked a little". "Who". She said "She has worked a little". (39) I said 'So, she will eat a little" and she put a little (food) out for her, she laid it by her head. She got up in the night, she ate and drank the water, until the fourth day. On the fourth day, she was forced to get up of her own accord, she washed the dishes, swept the house, made breakfast for me and we all ate together. (40) I went to work and returned. She made the food by herself and did the chores by herself, going to and fro in the house and she ran the house.[7] I did this to her. I did not beat her. I did not curse her. I did not teach her, nothing. I only said "Whoever does not work cannot eat in my house"'. (41) He (the king) held him and kissed him. He said 'Blessed be the cradle in which you grew up. If you have done this,[8] come here and I shall make you the vizier. Stay with me and I shall give you as much land as you want. Work on it and employ people'. (42) He said 'No. God has given me this way. I shall go on this way very contently. I have land that is sufficient. We are (three), myself, mother and the wife. (If) my mother dies tomorrow, we shall shall remain, myself and my wife. I have land that is sufficient. Thank you very much'. (43) The king tried (to persuade him) and so forth (saying) 'Come, stay with me'. He said 'No. If I come tomorrow, you will blame me. You will say to me "Ah, I have given you land and have given you a daughter, and now you are not obeying me". Perhaps I shall not obey you. Then, perhaps you will even cut off my head'. (44) He said 'Go. Let the girl be blessed for you and you be blessed throughout your days. May God grant you (bounty) in this world and the next. I have left it there and come here.

(1) There was a man and a wife. They had children. Every day the man would go down to the market to do shopping, but would bring nothing back. (His wife) said 'See how much this ox will go for, sell it'. (2) So, he took the ox and went down to sell it. He went down to the top of the town and cried 'Hey, who will buy an ox?' Everybody came. Nothing like that had happened in the town. They had not seen (such a thing). They came and gathered together. (3) A mullah came. The mullah said 'I shall buy it, but only if it has three legs'. That is, he should cut off one foot so that it would become three-legged. He cut off one of the ox's feet and the ox began to limp back and forth. (4) He said 'Get away with you! When it was four-legged I did not buy it. Should I buy it three-legged? I shall not buy it. Who will buy it like that? (A person) would not buy it for one coin. (Even that would be) a lot', and so forth. (5) A teacher came. The teacher said 'If it were two-legged, I would buy it'. He cut off another leg. The ox fell down. The ox fell down and a jurist came. He said 'Will you sell it to me if it has one leg?' He said 'All this fuss,[1] now one leg! Take the leg and stick it in your mother!' (6) He cut up the ox. (He had cut off) three legs and one leg remained. It remained there, it remained there at a bargain price, but nobody bought it. Finally the ox died. (7) He went up to the house, sad, weeping, beating himself (thinking that) his children would be without food. He said 'Wife, the situation is like this'. He said 'I went down to the town and cried out like this 'Is there anybody who will buy an ox?' (8) A mullah came and said to me 'If it is three-legged, I shall buy it'. I cut off one of its legs. I said "Perhaps he will buy it", but I saw that he laughed at me. He said "I would not buy it with four legs, would I buy it with three?" (9) After him a teacher came. He said "I shall buy it if it has two legs". I cut off another one. (Only) two remained. The ox fell down. A jurist came and said "If the situation is like this, I shall buy it if it has one leg"'. He said 'I cut off also that leg and threw it away. The ox died, it collapsed there. Nobody came to buy it. It went for nothing. Dogs ate it and it was finished'. She said 'Is that so husband?' He said 'Yes'.

(10) What was their house like? They had two rooms. In one room they slept. The other one was (for) the animals, it was a basement stable, as we call it. It was dark. They would put a board down, they would put a board down like this to go into it, there were no steps, to go down to the basement stable. They put a board down like this to go down there. (11) She said 'Husband, it's all right. I shall go down (to the town). The woman went down (to the town) and saw the mullah. The mullah had a shop of household goods, that is sugar, tea, fabrics, such things as these, and soap. (12) She greeted him and said 'Hey mullah, how are you? How are you doing?' and so forth. He said 'I am well, thank you very much. How are things?' She said 'Indeed I have come with the intention of buying a few things for the house'. (13) He said 'Take everything you want'. She winked her eye at him. The mullah was happy. He said 'Take anything you want'. She took a basket that was full like this. She said 'Mullah, let me tell you something'. He said 'What?' (14) 'The day after tomorrow come to lunch, you are invited to our home'. He said 'Where is your house?' She said 'In such-and-such a place'. He said 'I see'.[2] She said 'Come to lunch and I shall cook something'. He said 'Go up (back home)'. (15) He did not take money from her. She went up and took up (with her) material, she took up soap, she took up sugar, she took up everything she wanted. She said 'Look husband, look listen (to what I have to say)'. (16) She went down the next day to the jurist, who had a shop. They were all shopkeepers. She greeted the jurist 'How are you?[3] How are you doing? How is your work?' He said 'Thank you, all is well. How are things?' She said 'I want to buy a few things for my children at home'. She said 'meat, chickens, if you have them, sugar, tea, such things as that'. (17) He said 'Take anything you want'. She took it and said 'Jurist', she said 'Let me tell you something. Don't tell it to anybody'. He said 'What?' She said 'You are invited in the evening to dinner on the third day (from now), on the third day, that is after two days, the third day,[4] come to us'. He said 'Where is your house?' She said 'In such-and-such a place'. He said 'Yes, I know it, I'll come'. (18) On the third day she went down again. She went down and met the teacher. The teacher was in a big shop. He had every kind of thing in it. She went and put her hand on his shoulder, and so forth 'Come, let me tell you'. She was merry with him and he became happy.

I am poor'. (20) He said 'Of course, you are welcome, my lady. I shall come. (I promise) by these eyes (of mine) that I shall come. Take whatever you want. This shop is before you. Take whatever you want'. (21) She began to take (things) and took everything she could. She took them and put them in her bag. Then she set off on the road and went up (home). She went up and said to her husband, she said 'Husband, take note that the three people who slaughtered the ox,—I have made an assignation with the three of them. (22) They will come here. Each time you hide yourself outside. At lunchtime, as soon as lunchtime has come and you have seen a man coming—the mullah will come and enter the house—after five or ten minutes you come back. Shout out "'ahə, 'ahə", like that, so that I know. You have nothing (else) to do. (23) Then, you go out, and in the evening (do) the same. You be outside all the time and wait for whoever comes here. After five minutes you should come in, and (do the same) in the evening, tonight, at dinner-time'. He said 'Fine, wife'.

(24) The third day came. He had his breakfast and went out. He went out, went off and kept watch. At lunchtime the mullah came. The mullah said 'Greetings to you' She said 'Welcome mullah! Welcome! Welcome! Please, sit down. Please, sit down'. (25) The mullah sat down, and so forth. She began by bringing water. He put it by him and began to drink water, and so forth, then her husband (cried) 'Wo!'⁵ There was not, however, an ass with him, nothing. He cried out (pretending) that he had gone up for wood, to fetch wood. Her husband came back. (26) She said 'Mullah, take this stick in your hand, a long stick, take it in your hand and go into this room. Close the door behind you. Be careful, since we have jinn, we have jinn. We have demons in this house. Be careful they do not accost you. (Stay there) until my husband goes'. (27) What did he do? He quickly got up, took the long stick and entered the room, by the board. She closed the door behind him. She closed the door behind him and he remained there.

(28) Time passed, the hours passed, and it became evening. At that time the jurist came. The jurist came (and said) 'Greetings to you'. 'Welcome, jurist. Welcome. Please sit down'. He also sat down. When he came, she brought some water. She said 'Let me bring some tea and we shall drink. There is nobody here in the house. He (my husband) has sent his children to another place.' (29) He (the jurist) sat down. He had not yet drunk the glass of tea when a voice came from outside the house 'Wo!' He said 'Who is that?' She said 'My husband has returned. Hide yourself!' She gave another stick to him. She said 'Be careful. There are jinn and demons in this room. Be careful. As soon as they hit you, they will kill you and eat you'. (30) He said 'Fine'. He got up, took the stick in his hand and entered (the room). When he entered, there was space for him to stand. She closed the door behind him and he also remained there.

(31) The late evening came, time for her to eat dinner, then the teacher came (and said) 'Many greetings. How are you?'[6] She said 'Welcome, welcome. Thank you very much for this food that you have given me, chicken, meat, sugar, tea, soap. You have given me all kinds of things. Thank you very much. But please sit down. I shall heat the food so that you and I can eat together'. (32) He said 'There is nobody in the house?' She said 'No, only me. I am alone. This bed is for me and you'. He said 'That's good'. She began to stir the food, then her husband came back 'Wo!' He said 'Who is it?' She said 'My husband has come back. He had gone to our neighbours' house. Look he has returned'. (33) He said 'What should I do?' She said 'What should we do? Take this stick and go into this room. But be careful. There are jinn in it, (be careful) they do not kill you'. He said 'Come on, what are you saying?' She said 'Yes, by God, look, be careful!' (34) He also got up and took the stick. He entered the room and, what do you say,[7] he knocked into the one next to him, he knocked into the jurist. The jurist knocked into the mullah. They slid down into the basement stable, beating each other. It was dark. (35) She had closed the door after them and it was dark. One was beating the other, one was beating the other. They thought they were jinn. They beat one another until the three of them died. When the three of them died, she opened the door and did not hear the voice of anybody. The three were dead.

(36) At night she went out and found a man. She said 'Come, my dear, let me tell you something'. He said 'What?' She said 'Please be a porter—a porter, that is somebody who carries people, carries something, he is called a porter—she said 'Come, come to our home and I'll tell you'. (37) He went to their home. He said 'So, woman. What do you want to say?' She said ', but be careful, our dead return. Bury him well so that he does not return.' He said 'Yes'. (38) The mullah was taken out first, he was taken out into their room. Woosh his hand (caught hold of) the leg of the mullah and he put him behind his neck. Now, while it was night, he went off and found a valley, and he put him into it. He put him into it and came back. (39) Before he came back, she took out the jurist. She took out the jurist and placed him there. She said 'Did I not tell you that he would return, that the dead would return? Look he has returned'. 'Come on. What are you saying?' She said '(I swear) by your head. You put him there, but he has come back here before you'. 'Come on. What are you saying?' (40) He lifted him up, loaded him on his back and took him away. He threw him in a very deep place. He said 'So that he will not come out'. He threw him down into a deep pit. (41) The teacher was then brought out. She brought out the teacher there (in the house). She said 'Where did you throw him that he has come back before you so quickly?' He said 'What are you saying? I put him in a deep pit from which he could never come out'. He said 'Give him to me here'. (42) He was angry. He put him on his back and went up to the water-mill. He went up to the water tank[8] and placed him in the tank in the water. The mill caretaker went down—the person who looks after the water-mill is called the caretaker (ʾažvana)—he opened the door and sees that the water-mill has stopped. (43) He saw what the problem was. The water was not flowing. That man (the teacher) had come down into the water. He (the porter) opened the door and saw the caretaker there. He beat the caretaker with a stick and killed him. He killed the caretaker there and fled. (44) He went to the woman and said, he said 'Well, has he not returned? Has that dead man of ours not returned?' She said 'Why should he return?' 'Do you know where I put him?' She said 'Where?' (45) He said 'I put him in the tank of the water-mill. He wanted to come out and he did come out. He wanted to come out and he opened the door of the mill, he wanted to come out, but I hit him with a stick on his head and killed him. He is (still) there'.

A23   The Man Who Wanted to Work

Informant: Dawið 'Adam (Dure)

(1) There was a man, a Kurd. He said 'Everybody goes to work. I also shall go to work and work. He set off. The name of his village was Barwore. His aunt was in Sarzar and his uncle was in the Daštane. He said to his father and mother, he said 'Father and mother, I also shall go and work, so that I can learn (how to do) a job'. (2) His father and mother said 'My son, why not? Go on. Everybody works. You also go and work'. He went to the house of his aunt, his aunt, the sister of his father. 'Hey, my son, where are you coming from?' 'By God, I'm coming from home, aunt' 'Where (are you going)?' (3) He said 'I want to go to my uncle. My uncle is rich, he will give me a job so that also I can work. Everybody works, I also shall work with him'. She said 'Why not?' (4) She made him food, some eggs. (When) it was morning, she made him food, eggs, oil and roasted meat. She said—his name was Ummo—she said 'Ummo, I am going to take food to my husband.[1] You eat and go to the house of your uncle'. He said 'Fine, aunt'. (5) Then she, poor thing, went off while he stayed and ate the food that was in front of him. He said 'Perhaps when I have set out on the road, I shall be hungry. I'll take something for myself with me in my hand so that when I go on the road, if I get hungry, I can eat it'. (6) When he had finished the food, he took four or five eggs. He took four or five eggs and put them under his hat. He took roasted meat and put it in his pockets. There was what we call a kawaza ('jar') with oil in it. (7) He put his hand in it to take out some oil, but his hand got stuck in it. He tried to take it all out, but it did not come out. He was perplexed. He remained in that predicament until his aunt came. His aunt came and she said 'Hey, Ummo, what are you doing?' He said 'Aunt, do you want the truth?' (8) He said 'I wanted to take a little oil to eat on the way, a little oil and bread, but my hand has got stuck in this thing, pot of oil, and it does not come out'. She said 'Confound you![2] Go!' She struck him like this on his head and the eggs ran down on him here. (9) 'What is this?' He said 'I also took some eggs. I thought perhaps I shall be hungry'. He was near the fire. The fire was near and the roast meat heated up. The oil of the roast meat came out of his pockets.

(11) He went on his way, he went to his uncle's house. He said 'Greetings to you uncle'. He said 'Welcome. Well, what do you want?' He said 'I want you to give me a job'. He said 'What kind of work do you do?' He said 'This is the first time I am going out (to work). I don't know any (kind of) work'. (12) He said 'I have seven asses. Every day go up and take those seven asses up the mountain. Bring back wood with them. That is your job. Do you want it?' He said 'Yes. That is a good job, uncle'. He went off and took those asses up the mountain. (13) Well, seven asses were a lot for him to collect wood and put on their backs. Wolves came and ate his asses. What did he do? He put the blankets, the blankets of the asses, he loaded the seven blankets on his back and brought them down. (14) He brought them down to the meeting room, the meeting room of his uncle was full. The meeting room was here and this was its roof (adjacent to the mountain). He came straight from the mountain across the roof and threw those things on his back into the meeting room of his uncle. (15) All the people looked at it and saw that asses' blankets were there. His uncle called him and said 'Ummo, Ummo, come here'. He said 'But what is this?' He said 'Uncle, the asses, the seven of them have been eaten by wolves'. He said 'I have brought their blankets'. (16) He said 'Fine. They died and you are safe.⁴ He said 'Go to the wife of your uncle.⁵ See what job she can find for you. Work in the house'. He said 'Yes'.

(17) One day the house had been plastered, that is newly decorated, with mud, they plaster it, with round flat stones, which we call šənduxyaθa. There was a food store. What is a food store? It is wheat, sesame, millet, barley, everything put in leather bags, with their mouth placed thus (facing forward). (18) A large pot of date syrup also was placed in their store. She said to him, the wife of his uncle said 'Look, we have (newly) plastered this room. Don't let any person or animal enter it'. He said 'Fine'. He sat at the door.

(19) He sat at the door, until it dried, but a cat came, leapt, entered through the door and stood by that pot of date syrup. He said 'The wife of my uncle said that no person and no animal should enter this room. This (cat) has messed everything up with its feet'—the room was (newly) plastered. (20) He picked up a small stone, he picked it up to throw it at the cat, but it did not hit the cat but rather hit right in the middle of the date syrup, of the pot of date syrup. It was pierced and broke. The date syrup began to run out. The date syrup spilt into the room. (21) He went to take from the mouth of the bag of millet, take the cloth from the mouth (of the bag of) millet to put it in the mouth of the pot of syrup. All the millet fell down into the syrup. The syrup and the millet seed were mix together. The room was filled with them. (22) The wife of his uncle came and said 'Ummo, what have you done?' He said 'By God, did you not say that no animal and no person should enter the room? A cat came, entered and stood by the pot. I picked up a small stone and threw it at him. It did not hit it, but hit the pot. The pot broke. (23) I went and took the cloth that is in the mouth of the bag of millet. I thought I would put it in the (pot of) syrup so that it does not pour out. The millet fell down into it. What should I do? It is not my fault'. (24) She said 'Its is all right, don't worry'. They went and put (the room) in order once again. They closed the door so that nobody would go into it.

(25) His uncle said 'Look, only I am 'Abda-Raḥmān, 'Abda-Raḥmān-bēk is my name. If anybody comes and says ''Abda-Raḥmān-bēk', do not open the door to him. It is only me (who is called 'Abda-Raḥmān)'. There was somebody who was listening behind the door. He was listening when he said to Ummo 'I am the only 'Abda-Raḥmān, do not let anybody come in the house'. (He was listening) so that he (the intruder) could go to his wife. (26) So, he (the uncle) closed the door. Then, when it was night, there was a knock at the door. 'Who are you?' He said 'I am 'Abda-Raḥmān, open the door'. He opened the door and he (the intruder) entered and went to sleep with the wife of 'Abda-Raḥmān-bēk, with the wife of his uncle. (27) Afterwards somebody else knocked on the door 'Who is it?' He said 'I am 'Abda-Raḥmān'. He said 'How many 'Abda-Raḥmāns are there? One 'Abda-Raḥmān, two 'Abda-Raḥmāns? For whom should I open the door?' He said 'The person who has gone in (before me) is a villain. He is a thief, he is a murderer. Open the door to let me in so that we can kill him'.

(28) He opened the door. There was a hatch,[6] a hatch for them to go down into the basement stable, by a ladder. He (the intruder) opened it and went down in the basement. The door of the basement was closed. His real uncle went in. He said 'Where is the second 'Abda-Raḥmān?', and so forth. (29) 'He has gone down into the basement'. Each of them took a long knife and went down. They went down searching for 'Abda-Raḥmān, searching for 'Abda-Raḥmān, and so forth. It was dark. There was no light and no electricity. (30) He saw an ox. Ummo saw an ox and cut off the head of the ox. He said 'Uncle, I have slaughtered an ox'. He said 'That's all right, so long as 'Abda-Raḥmān does not get away'. He went and came to the horse. He slaughtered also the horse. (31) He went to catch 'Abda-Raḥmān but 'Abda-Raḥmān opened the door, went out and ran away. He had killed the asses, killed the horse, killed the ox. He had killed them all. He (the uncle) still said 'That is all right'. (32) 'Abda-Raḥmān (the intruder) ran away and disappeared. He (the uncle) came back and said 'Be off with you! Go away! You have destroyed my house! Is this the kind of work that you do? Don't do any more work'. He drove him away. (33) He drove him away and he went back to his aunt's house, his aunt's house, where he had taken eggs and put them on his head. She said 'Hey, Ummo, you have returned!' He said 'Yes, my uncle did not have any work to give me, so I returned'. (34) She said 'Is that so? What did you do? What happened?' He said 'By God, do you want the truth?' She said 'Yes'. He said 'He gave me a job'. He said 'He gave me seven asses "Go up and fetch wood with them. Get on with it!"'. He said 'So, I went up (the mountain)—I was innocent, I did not know (what I was doing)—I went up and collected the wood and piled them up. (35) There were seven asses. While I was collecting wood, wolves were busy eating the asses. I took the saddle blankets, loaded them on my back, brought them down and threw them into the house'. She said 'Then, what else?' (36) He said 'The wife of my uncle had plastered a room. A cat came and entered. I threw a stone, but it hit some date syrup. Syrup and millet seed got mixed together. The wife of my uncle did not tolerate this. She said "Go away". (37) Then my uncle said "No, no, don't worry". He said to me as follows "There are (other men), but it is only me who is called 'Abda-Raḥmān. Do not let anybody come into the house. Another 'Abda-Raḥmān came. Another 'Abda-Raḥmān came and I said "Which 'Abda-Raḥmān? (How) do I know which is my uncle and which not?"'"

(1) There was once a king. He had three sons. The king became advanced in age, he became about sixty or seventy years old and became blind, that is he became sightless.[1] (2) He said to his sons 'My sons, cure me![2] Find a remedy for my eyes, so that I can see people and the things around me.[3] I have become blind. I can no longer see and I cannot walk.' (3) He gave each of them money. He gave each of them a hundred dinars. He said 'Go and bring a remedy for my eyes.' The three sons of his set off and went on their way. The three sons of his went on their way in the world, searching in order to find the remedy for the eyes of their father. (4) They travelled and arrived in a certain town. The eldest one said 'I shall remain here in this town.' 'What will you do?' He said 'I'll find a job and I'll make inquires in order to find a remedy for the eyes of my father.'[4] He went off and met a person who was making kebabs. He said 'Now, I want to work with you. Will you employ me?' He said 'Yes, why not?' (5) He said 'How much will you give me?' He said 'I shall give you fifty dinars each month. Each month I shall give you fifty dinars, now work with these labourers.' He said 'Fine.' The eldest one remained there. The other two went off. (6) The two went off. Also the middle one came to a town and said 'My brother, I also shall stay here and ask for a job, in order to find a job here, and for us to ask about a remedy for my father. He went off and found a shepherd. In ancient Syriac this is called r̥iya ('shepherd'), r̥iyət ʔər̥be ('a shepherd of sheep').[5] (7) He said 'I want to become a shepherd, a shepherd.[6] Don't you want me?' He said 'Why not? We'll give you fifty dinars every month.' He said 'Fine.' He also stayed there. That left the young one.[7] He went on the road. He went along for six or seven days and came upon an old man, whose beard reached the ground.

[1] This phrase is a gloss on the meaning of the verbal form smele.
[2] Literally: Make a cure for me.
[3] Literally: a thing and circumstances.
[4] Literally: I'll ask—and find—about a remedy…'.
[5] These are, in fact, modern dialect forms, not Classical Syriac. The word šăvana is a Kurdish loan-word.
[6] The second word is a gloss of the first.
[7] Literally: The young one remained.

(16) Then, you should enter. Twenty rooms are closed. You should open these. Close the ones that are open. You will reach the last room. Her bird is situated in the window (there). Before it calls out like a cock, take some of the food and place it before the bird. The bird will eat. Then, you should enter. (17) There are forty sheets, forty sheets on top of her. She is asleep. On the fortieth day she will get up. She has been lying down, asleep, for forty days. She has a book under her head—you should take it. She has a pipe there. (If) you want to smoke a pipe, or want to eat food (it is there). (18) You should take the book and come back. Take some of the food of the bird and put it in your pockets, the bird will not speak (in protest). Take it and put in in your bag and come back.' He said 'Have you understood my son?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'Is that so?' He said 'Yes'.

(19) He went off. He went off on the road. He travelled to the mountain. He went up and, as he had said, the legs of his horse were all cut and blood flowed down it. In the end, he went up onto the mountain and afterwards began to come down in the salt. He crossed also the salt. (20) He reached the two stones that knocked together. He passed also these. He reached the water. Two girls came and he cut off their head. In short, he did everything that I have said to you. He came back, then went and took the bird, then returned. (21) When he returned, he came to his elderly man, the old one, he came and said 'I have brought the bird.' He took a feather. He put it on his eyes and his eyes became well, he was able to see. He said 'My son, may your bravery be blessed. Go and take it to your father and cure your father with it.' (22) He has the hundred dinars in his pocket, he has not spent them. He returned and went to the brother of his who was working as a shepherd. He went and said to the owner of the sheep, he said 'Won't you sell me this man? Won't you sell to me this shepherd of yours?' (23) He said 'Yes. How much will you buy him for?' He said 'I shall buy him for fifty dinars'. He said '(Since) I gave for him fifty dinars and he will give me fifty dinars, that's fine.' He said 'Give (them to me)!' He gave him fifty dinars, took his brother and brought him back. The other fifty remained. He went off and came to his brother who was selling kebabs. He took him also and gave away the other fifty dinars. He became penniless. (24) They came back. They came back and came near to home. They came near to the palace of the king. Now, there was a garden, in which there were apples. In the middle there was a spring. The young brother among them said 'My brothers, I have not slept, neither at night nor during the day. I am feeling sleepy, I'll sleep a little. Let's rest a little, then we shall go up to our home'.

We shall take it up (home) and say that it is we who have brought the bird.' Now, their brother went to sleep. Then they came and seized the boy. They seized him and gouged out his eyes, and threw them over there. (26) They went up, went up, and reached home. Their father did not see from here to here.[12] He said 'Oh, have you brought the bird?' They said 'Yes'. They started to put it (on his eyes), but they hurt more (than before). His eyes began to hurt since they had not eaten any of its food, which was in the pocket of their brother.

(27) The story goes, they left him like that. A dove came and sat on the apple tree. It said to him (the youngest brother) 'Look, if you are awake, listen! If you are asleep, wake up! Now I shall shake myself and feathers will fall from me near you. Gather them and burn them. Your left eye is in such-and-such place and your right eye is in such-and-such a place. Take them and put them in their place. Then wring out well the water of the feather upon them and you will be cured.' (28) The dove came and shook herself. All the feathers fell down there. He gathered them up and burnt them. He took his eyes and put them (back in their place). They were rather crooked. He became squint-eyed. He applied the water from the feathers to his eyes and they were cured to some extent. (29) He went up and said to the people 'Won't you give me a job, something or other, so that I can work in the house of the king'. They said 'We have no work. But we do have (the job of) cleaning the horse stable basement, cleaning them out, that's all (we have).' He said 'Fine'. He went down and stayed in the basement, sweeping and polishing, looking after the horses.

(30) We shall tell now of Parizada. Parizada woke up (and saw that) the bird was not there. She flew after the smell (of the bird). She came and settled behind the village where her bird was. She settled and set up her tent. She said 'Hey, I'll marry whoever has brought back my bird, but on condition that he tells me how he has brought it back'.

What did you see?' He said 'I did not see anything. I have brought back the bird, that's all.' She said 'Cut off his head!' Also his head was cut off. (32) Who was left? There remained the one who was in the horse stable. He went up. They passed the word on to him and said 'The situation is like this'. He said 'I'll go up'. He went up. He was squint-eyed. He had become squint-eyed. She said 'Ha, was it you who brought back my bird?' He said 'Yes. It was me who brought back your bird'. (33) She said 'How?' He said 'There was a mountain of knives. You had placed before me a mountain of knives. I crossed it. There was another mountain of salt and I crossed that. Two young women like you came and I cut off their head. There was a river, I stopped it and and jumped over. You had a lion on this side and a she-goat on that side. Before the lion there was grass. Before the she-goat there was meat. I took the meat from the she-goat and laid it down for the lion. From the lion I took the grass and I laid it down for the she-goat. (34) I entered. You had forty rooms. Twenty of them were open and I closed them. Twenty of them were closed and I opened them. Your bird was in the window. I offered it some food and it ate it. I entered your house. I took your book. I smoked your pipe. I took some food. I kissed you four times and came back.' (35) She said 'If you have done all of this, go and bring me the story of Warda and Nargis.' He said 'Fine'. He went down, he took some of the food and offered it to the bird. The bird ate it. He took a feather of the bird. He put it on the eyes of his father and his father was cured. Then he put on the clothes of the son of a king.[13] He put on his clothes and went up. (36) She said 'Come, come. Since it is you. Come, don't go'. He said 'That's impossible'. He said 'I shall go. I must bring the story of Warda and Nargis.' The story goes: He set off and went on his way, he sat on his horse one, two, three days and went on his way. He arrived at a village. It was a large village. It was a large town. The king was (resident) in it.

He said 'I shall come with you. The snake will not eat you. But I do not know at what time the snake will come. I shall sleep a little. I shall put my head on your leg. As soon as the snake comes, wake me.' She said 'Fine!' (40) The story goes: Then he lay down to sleep. He went to sleep. He went to sleep and during night the snake came. She wept. She did not dare to speak. She wept and the tears fell on his face. He woke up. He quickly got up. The snake came to him. Now, he had a spear. He struck each head of the snake that came (his way) and cut its head off. (41) The snake said 'I do not have just one head, I have seven heads.' He said 'I do not have one spear', I have seven spears'. Every head that came to him he cut off. Every head that came to him he cut off. He killed it. He cut off the ears of those snakes and put them in his bag. What did the girl do? She put her hand in the blood and then put it on his back, on the back of that boy. (42) He said to the girl 'Run, go down to the people.[15] Tell them not to drink this water. This water is the blood and pus of the snake. I have killed the snake.' She ran down (crying) 'Beware! Do not drink the water! Do not drink the water! The snake has been killed!', and so forth. Yet they shouted at her, throwing stones at her, (telling) her to go up for the snake to eat her. 'The snake is killed!'

(43) Shortly afterwards the water came down. Everybody began (to agree) not to gather water. It finished. Then good, pure water came down. Later he went to his old woman. He went and said to his old woman 'I have killed the snake. Shortly the water will become pure, then go and gather water.' The king made an announcement 'Whoever has killed the snake, let him come and become king. I shall become the vizier for him.' (44) Then some boys went and said 'We killed it. We killed it', (telling) lies. The girl says 'Lift up his shirt!' He lifts up his shirt and they do not see a (mark of a) hand placed on his back. She says 'Cut off his head!' They cut off his head. They did the same to the head of four or five other people. Then he said 'There is somebody at the home of the old woman. Perhaps it is him.' (45) The story goes: He went and delivered the message to him. He went and said 'Was it you who killed the snake?' He said 'Yes'. She lifted up his shirt and saw (the mark of) the hand of the king's daughter placed on his back. She had placed it in the blood and put it on his back. She said 'It is him, father'. He said 'Become king and I shall become the vizier.' He said 'No. I have a job to do. I must go. I also am the son of a king, but I have a job. I want to go to my job.' 'What is your job?' He said 'I shall not tell you.'

(46) He went off and came to a wood, to a large tree, which we call a poplar. (There was) a simarxa bird, a simarxa, which had fledglings in the nest.' A snake always used to go up and eat the fledglings. That man, the son of the king, what did he do? He killed that snake. He chopped it up and put it before the young of the simarxa. When they had eaten them,[16] he quickly went and hid himself. He hid himself, so that the simarxa would not eat him. (47) Shortly afterwards the simarxa came. She came, screeching and crying 'Ha, there is the smell of a foreign man'. He was hidden. The young of the simarxa cried out and said 'Come! Come! He has killed the one who used to eat your young.' They cried two or three times. She said 'Come out! I'll give you anything you want.' He did not come out. She said 'I promise, I'll do for you anything you want.' (48) He came out and came (to her)'. She said 'What do you want?' He said 'I want to go, (I want) you to take me to the palace of Warda and Nargis. She said '(Give me) the space of six or seven days, so that I can eat some meat and tail-fat of sheep, so that my feathers will regrow, so that I can take you, since the palace is far away.

(49) The story goes: He stayed six or seven days there, then went off. He waited six or seven days, then the simarxa came. She said 'Sit on my back'. He sat on the back of the simarxa. She was (like) an aeroplane. They went until they arrived at the palace, on top of the palace. She said 'Take from me these two feathers of mine. Whenever you need (me), burn them and I shall come here'. He took them and said 'Fine'. (50) He went up onto her back and closed his eyes. She went off. She said 'Open your eyes! He opened his eyes. They settled on top of the palace. The palace was built completely of human skulls. She took two feathers from her and gave them to him. She went back, she returned. Then he went down. He went down and offered his greetings. (51) Only Warda and Nargis were there. They had no children, nothing. 'Welcome! Where have you come from?' He said 'By God, my journey was long. I have come here to your home.' 'Well, what is your business?' He said 'I have come seeking to know what your story is.[17] Tell it to me. They said 'Do you see this palace? It is all built of skulls. One gap remains. That is the place of your head. We shall tell you our story and after we have finished our story, we shall cut off your head and put it in this gap'. (52) He said 'Fine. As you like.' He said 'Let's see, start (telling), what is your story?' The story goes: Nargis got up and began to bake bread, to knead bread. Warda took a long pomegranate stick and struck it on her back. He said 'You shall become a mare'. She became a mare. He sat on her back and went off into the meadow, in the grass, here and there, and brought her back.' (53) The son of the king said to him, he said 'Do it once again, so that she turns back again'. He said 'Do you want to turn back?' He hit her with three other wooden canes, he struck her. She turned back to what she was. Also she struck him and he became a mule and she sat on his back. She went and drove him round the meadow. After a while he said 'Make him come back, I feel sorry for him. Do not make him like that'. She struck him three more strokes and he also turned back. (54) It became night. She had a bead of sleep. She used to put it on the chest of Wɛrda and go to what we call hambišaye ('giants'). There was a cave in which there were forty giants. She would go and sit among them and make merry with them. Then she would come back. One day, the next day and the day after,[18] the boy went and followed her. He said 'Let's see where she is going.'

(1) There was a king in a village. That king had two daughters. His brother was poor. The brother of that king was poor. The poor brother lived at the bottom of the village. The king lived at the top of the village. (2) One day they had gone up (the mountains) out hunting, the two brothers had gone up hunting. The two wives were pregnant. The king said to the poor brother, he said 'My brother, our wives are both pregnant. If your wife gives birth to a girl and my wife gives birth to boy, your daughter (will be married) to my son. (3) If my wife gives birth to a daughter and your wife gives birth to a son, my daughter (will be married) to your son'. Who said this? The king. They came down (from hunting). (4) The time of giving birth arrived. They both gave birth on the same day. What did that little girl do? From the time she was born she started weeping, (and continued) until the time that she came to the boy. What was the name of the girl? Səttiye. The name of the boy was Farxo. Farxo and Səttiye. (5) Now, she got up, on the very day on which she was born and they put her in the cradle, the cot, and she went down, down, down, down, put her mouth on the mouth of Farxo and began sucking. At that time they stopped (crying). Neither of them had stopped (beforehand), but were constantly crying. (6) The mother of Səttiye said 'Let's see where my daughter is' and looked for her. 'Which woman has given birth?' He said 'The wife of your brother-in-law has given birth'. She went there and saw her, the two of them were asleep in the cradle. (7) She took the girl and brought her up. She took the girl up to the house and she again began crying, crying, crying, crying. At night she began again to go down (the village). She went down and did the same as before.

(8) The king became angry. The king became angry, although the king himself had said if I have a daughter I shall give her to your son. The king became angry about these events. He took the boy. He was a baby, that is he was not yet a month old. (9) He said 'Put him before the water spring and do not feed the horses. Do not give them water to drink, but only feed them so that they will go (to the water spring) and crush him.' The father and the mother of the boy went out into the world, they went to Syria.

(10) A woman called Hure came and took the boy. Ame[1] took him, he said 'Ame, put your vessel down there. Take me, take me off and put me in the meeting room of my uncle'.[2]

(11) His father and mother were expelled. He said 'Let's go. We shall not see our son, he has been murdered. They have put him in the horses' manger'. When they put him in the horses' manger, the horses did not eat or drink. They put him there and said 'The horses will kill him' He started singing to a brown horse. (12) He said 'I want you to blow on me and—excuse me[3]—turn your bum to the wall. He sang the same to a black horse and a white horse. Afterwards the king said 'Go down, by now they have pulled Farxo apart. Take him and throw him away and put new grass out for the horses'. (13) They went down but what (a surprise when) they went down. The horses were gathered over him, blowing onto him. They went up and gave word (to the king), saying 'My lord, the situation is like this, oh king' He said 'Go and bring him'. Now, they brought him there. (14) He began to sing, he said 'God has created for me on the first day a head. On the second day he created for me hands. On the third day he created for me an eye. On the fourth day—until the ninth month. He said 'God created me. Today, do to me whatever you like. Do it to me'. (15) He said 'I shall not kill you. Stay here in the house, brother, with these daughters of mine. I have three, Naze the eldest, Zine and Səttiye, the last, the youngest'. He said 'These are your sisters'. He said 'Fine'.

(16) Now, they got up one day and they said 'Let's go and swim'. They went off to swim. Naze, the eldest one—Farxo said (to her) 'Put a stone here, one here and one here. A stone'. He said to Səttiye 'Sit here. Səttiye sit here in the last place.' (17) Zine sat after her and Naze the first. The first, eldest girl was Naze. The second youngest was Zine and the third Səttiye. She put a stone far away. She said 'Farxo sit far over there'. Farxo sat on that far stone. Naze said 'Say which of us is the most beautiful'.

(18) He said 'Naze, you yourself are delicate, you are very beautiful. I look forward to the day when I see who you will marry'. He said 'Zine, you yourself are beautiful, also you Zine. I beseech the Lord God that I may be with you on the day that you marry'. He said 'Above all is Səttiye. Poor (me), Farxo, (I) who am waiting in hope for her'.

(19) Naze, the eldest, turned away in anger. She went to her father. She said 'Father. Do you know what Farxo did to us?' He said 'What did he do?' She said 'We came and he arranged us, me first, Zine next and Səttiye last. He sat far away. (20) He said 'Naze is like this, Zine is like this' but he said 'I love Səttiye. Səttiye is the most beautiful'. He threw stones at us and did not allow us to swim. He threw stones when we were swimming in the nude. He went and looked at us, throwing stones'. He said 'No, you are a liar'. He said 'I shall ask Zine, the second one'. (21) He said 'Hey, daughter, what do you say? What went on with your Farxo?[4] She said 'Father. Do you want the truth?' He said 'Yes'. She said 'Naze said to Farxo "Put a stone here, a stone here, and one here" and put one for Farxo. She said "Which of us is the most beautiful?" (22) He sang to her and said "Naze is like this". He sang to Zine and said "Above all is Səttiye. I love Səttiye"'. He said 'Confound you![5] He is a brother to you. You should not say that he is a betrothed or something. He is a brother to you'. He became their brother.

(23) One day they set off and said 'Let's go to the sheep'. They went to the sheep. At that time there (were two men), Čixalo and Ašebaṭalo, they were both shepherds of the king. Every daughter that was born to the king—first he (Čixalo) loved Naze. He said 'I'll remain a slave for seven years, so long as you give me Naze'. (24) In the second year Zine was born. He went and said—it is Čixalo saying this—he went and said 'King, will you still give me your daughter? You should give me Zine'. He said 'Fine. You finish your seven years, and I'll give Zine to you'. (25) Now, in the third year Səttiye was born. He went again to him and said 'King, if you please. You will still give me a daughter, is that not so?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'You should give me Səttiye'. He said 'Fine. I'll give you Səttiye. Finish your seven years and I'll give you Səttiye'. (26) Now, when Səttiye was born, she was the most beautiful of all. They went to make sheep suck (from their mothers), make lambs suck. (When) the season came and the sheep sucked, the lambs sucked from their mothers, he said 'Let's separate them from one another.' Ašebaṭalo played the pipe. (27) He gathered the sheep together and they went off for a while according to the tune of the pipe. He played another tune on the pipe and the sheep returned, by themselves, without a shepherd driving them back or anybody.

(28) The other one, Čixalo, he was busy (with the girls). He wanted to marry. Now, when they (the girls and Farxo) set off, he (Čixalo) said 'Let's separate the sheep, the young lambs on one side and the sheep on the other side.' One lamb made itself like a bow. (29) Farxo and Səttiye were together. They (the sheep) were all standing in a row. They put the sheep like this and took out the young lambs. One lamb made itself like a bow and pushed itself between Səttiye and Farxo. Each of them started grasping the other. The button of the blouse of Səttiye was torn off and Farxo saw her breast. (30) Čixalo, from nearby, saw them and noticed that he saw her breast, and became angry. He went and complained to the king. He said 'There is a person, called Farxo, he has gone to do such-and-such to the girls, to do such-and-such, and so forth'. He said 'He has done something unmentionable to the girls'.[6] The king believed him.

(31) What did he (Farxo) do? He said to Ašebaṭalo (when) he was playing the pipe 'What kind of person is he (Čixalo)—won't you tell me?—going complaining about me?' and so forth. While saying this to him, Farxo also took up the pipe and played pipe music, the young lambs were one side and the sheep the other. He (Ashebaṭalo) said 'Let him go (and complain), (a curse be) upon his mother. I want you (Farxo as a shepherd)'. (32) He (Farxo) said 'What am I? I shall not become a shepherd for you'—Farxo was speaking. He said 'I shall go'. Səttiye heard that her father had appointed executioners, who would cut off the head of Farxo. This was because he (Čixalo) had complained. He (the king) said 'It is no use' (he should be executed)'. (33) Farxo filled the bag of Čixalo with stones and threw it down. He did the works.[7] He put holes in all his clothes, tore up his bag and went off. He went off, and she said 'If Farxo is wise, he must come and make an ablution, that is pray, and then go home'. (34) She laid down three beads, beads of rosaries. She put them on the stone slab of the spring, one red, one white and one blue. Farxo came and said 'I shall not enter the town'. He said 'I'll go to the spring, drink water, wash my face, pray, then I shall enter the town'. (35) Now, he went and saw them (the beads) and he laughed. When he laughed he took them, saying 'This red one is my blood. This blue one is my spirit. This white one is my soul.' (36) He said 'It was Səttiye who put these here. I understand. Indeed the king my uncle has sworn on my head (to execute me). He will appoint executioners and (has sworn) he will kill me. I shall not go. I shall not go to my uncle.' At that time he was living with his uncle.

(37) He went off into the alleys. He slept in the alleys of the village. Səttiye searched and found him. He said to her, he said 'What should I do? Why has your father done this?' She said 'Look, I'll tell you. He has sworn on your head (to execute you). Čixalo has said such-and-such'. (38) She said 'But go down to your maternal uncle's house, go down and lodge in the house of your maternal uncle. Only I will know where you are'. He said 'All right'. They slept and kissed one another. A mullah came. It was four o'clock. A mullah came and saw them. He saw them sleeping next to each other. (39) He said to the mullah, he said 'Mullah, why are you looking at me? Don't you know that she has been betrothed to me since before she was born? She is my wife'. The mullah said 'What business have I with these people? He left them there and went to the mosque.

(40) He got up in the morning, took one of his father's horses, sat on its back and went down. He went down, let's say from Dure going down to Amedia. He sat on the back of his horse and went all the way up to the top of Amedia. He went up to the top of Amedia and saw that the fire in the summer house of his maternal uncle, where he was making for, had not yet gone out. (41) He pitched his tent over the fire and sat over the fire. Heavy snow fell. At the top of Amedia snow used to fall to the height of a man. The mountain is high. More and more snow fell, until the bell that was over the tent stopped (ringing). It stopped (due to the heavy snow) and he together with his horse entered the tent. (42) He came out and sang a song in the snow. He said 'I have come, running away from my paternal uncle, wishing to go to stay with my maternal uncle'. He said 'Oh God, why have you done this to me, bringing (snow) and blocking my road, so that I cannot go down to the house of my maternal uncle?' (43) He went and laid down his head and went to sleep. He slept and (when) he got up in the morning he found that fog was rising from the ground. All the snow melted. He started singing and birds came at (the sound of) his voice. He was a fine singer and his voice was very beautiful. (44) What is my voice (in comparison with his)? However many times we sit together, I shall never be able to be like him. He was a fine singer, (to the extent that) leaves fell from the trees. (45) Now, a man came up with an ass, he came up to fetch wood. He heard his voice. He said 'Ah, that is Farxo (I am) a hundred percent (sure)'. This was because his maternal uncle used to talk about him. What was his maternal uncle? The chief of Amedia. (46) Now, he quickly ran down and said to his maternal uncle. He said 'King, if you please'. He said 'A man has come, whose voice is very beautiful, and when he sings, nightingales gather at his voice and the leaves of the wood fall'.

(47) He said 'Surely it is him. It is Farxo, my nephew. (When) he comes and enters the town and greets you, none of you should accept his greeting. (When) he enters the town and offers a greeting, do not accept his greeting.

(48) Now, what did his maternal uncle do? He brought three vessels, three vessels (and put them down) here. One of them had cracked walnuts, with walnut kernels, placed in it. One of them (contained) meat and bones, one raisins and walnut kernels togther. He placed them here. He put a cloth over them. (49) He said 'If he is my nephew, he will come and will know what these are[8] under this cloth'. He left a place so that he could sit by his maternal uncle. He came and said 'Greetings to you', after which nobody accepted his greetings. He himself said 'Welcome, a hundred welcomes'. (50) Now, he stood at the door like this. The nephew went over to the uncle, but he put before him horseshoes and nails. He (put) horseshoes and nails. The nephew went over to the uncle and said that he had put meat and bones before him. He said them all. He knew them, while the cloth was on them. (51) He said 'Look now you know[9] that he is my nephew'. He held him, kissed him and put him in his place. He put him in his place, he stood up and began talking, and so forth. He is the child of the story. He has grown up.

(52) Night came. He went up onto the roof. He said 'You see it with binoculars, as far as you can seen, that is my land'. But that palace far over there, that is not my land'. He said 'Uncle, what is the story of that palace?' He said 'Drop (the subject), nephew. That is a long story, which cannot be told'. He said 'Tell it. Let's hear what it is'.

(53) He said 'There is a woman there, who is a fine singer. That palace is all (built) with the skulls of people. She has built all that palace with skulls. Leave alone over there. I don't want (anything to do with) that palace'. He said 'Well, uncle. Now I know'. They went to sleep. (54) They went to sleep and he got in the night. He sat on the back of his horse and off he went, he went on and on and on, until he reached the palace. I tell you the wall of the palace was fifty metres, its height was fifty metres. (55) Three times his horse came up to jump but could not do so. He sang a song to his horse and his horse jumped over it and came down (the other side).

(56) She had a large pool. He immersed himself in the pool and swam. He had released his horse in the meadow. Her maid-servant came down when she saw him. The waist cord—we call it a waist cord—, the straps, of the maid-servant snapped, since she saw that he was handsome. (57) She remained at the water spring, and then she went up, late, she went up and told her mistress. She (the mistress) said to her 'Why have come late?' She said 'Don't you know what happened?' She said 'No'. (58) My waist cord broke. A very handsome youth has come and released his horse in your meadow. He has immersed himself in your pool and is swimming. Doves are (flying) over him. Why are you sitting here? Get up and see! Look at him!' (59) She got up and looked and what a sight she sees! He was enjoying himself. He had immersed himself in the water. She shouted from the casement. We call that (type of) window a casement. (60) She shouted and said 'Hey, my dear! What are you doing there? Does that spring not belong to somebody? Is the meadow in which you have put your horse without owners? Don't you think of people? Don't you think about this palace, which is all skulls. One (space for) a skull remains for your head. What do you say?' (61) He said 'We'll see, repeat what you said again'. She said 'Whose is this pool in which you are swimming?' She said 'It is mine'. He said 'Now it is mine. I am swimming in it. Do you want to swim? Come and swim!' (62) She said 'Look, I'll tell you. If you know (the answer to) my test, I shall indeed marry you. If you do not know (the answer to) my test, I shall put your head in that opening that remains'. He said 'Tell me'.

(63) She is a singer. She sings and he answers. Now, she sang and said 'I shall become a simarxa, a bird, and sit on your back. I shall go up to the sky and come back, striking you and causing you to sink and go down to the bottom of the seas'. He said 'I shall become an eagle and sit on your back, burying you in the ground'. (64) She said 'I shall become a thorn bush and search after you and seize you'. He said 'I shall become a farmer, that is a peasant—what do they say?—a sower. I shall cut all those roots of yours. I shall cut all your roots'. (65) Everything she said he replied to. She could not beat him. Afterwards she said 'I have become your wife'. He went up to her and ate something. They spoke to each other and she gave him a ring, they exchanged rings, and so forth. (66) He said 'Look, I'll tell you. I have not come to marry'. He said 'I shall go home. I shall go to the house of my uncle's family. If I come back, then you are my wife. If I do not come back, do anything you want'. He said goodbye to her and went to the house of his uncle. He showed the ring and showed the (wedding) scarf, and so forth. He said 'How (could this be)?' He said 'She sang and could not beat me. She could not'. He said 'Congratulations'.[11]

(70) Now, we shall tell of another trial, taking place in the social gathering of his paternal uncle, his paternal uncle who almost killed him. This happened in the social gathering of his paternal uncle, who almost killed him, his paternal uncle, the king. Nobody could fulfil that condition. (71) He got up and called to his daughters. He said 'Don't you know where Farxo is?' They said 'No'. Zine said 'I do not know'. Naze said 'I do not know'. As for Səttiye, he had sent a letter (for her) under the wing of a dove. He sent it under the wing of a dove. (72) While they were bathing, the dove went and threw it by Səttiye. Səttiye went and grabbed the dove like this and took it. She read the letter. She answered it and gave it to the dove. She said to Naze 'Go and grab that dove'. She went to grab it but it flew off. Zine went to grab it but it flew off. Səttiye went and grabbed it, it stood still. (73) She gave it the paper and it took it to Farxo'. She said 'I shall come to you. Do not move from your maternal uncle's home'. At that time she did not know how to go (to see him). It was announced that Səttiye knew where Farxo was. (74) The father of Səttiye, Naze and Zine said 'Do you know where he is?' She said 'Yes, I know. But there is a condition. I cannot go down just like that (without conditions). (80) After that they (the soldiers) started beating people. They started beating people and seizing people, and so forth. He said 'Uncle, they are seizing people!' After a while they seized him. They seized him and brought him into the presence of Səttiye. Səttiye was dressed in the clothes of soldiers. She was a commander, a colonel, important (in rank). (81) After a while, she said to him—he did not know that she was a woman, he thought she was a man—she said to him 'You are doing (bad) things, you are taking a woman from her husband and wedding her to yourself. I have heard that you are doing many wicked things, going to people's palaces, going and doing mischief, and so forth.

(82) She began shouting at him and said 'You are doing this (mischief), you are not from this land'. He remonstrated 'I have not done anything, in this place or that place,' etc. and so forth. Then, she took her hat from her head like this and put it on the ground. (83) He looked at her and saw it was Səttiye. He said 'Oh, it seems you are Səttiye!' He said 'Are you married or are you unmarried?' She said 'I have not married. I am waiting for you. I shall not marry, so long as you do not marry'. He said 'I also am not married'. (84) He said 'How are things? What has happened?' She said 'In the meeting of my father there is a riddle and nobody knows it. He said to me "Farxo knows it, go and bring him". I have brought this force here, which is at my command, so that you would come back and solve the riddle'.

(85) He said 'Fine'. He said 'You go up today, Wednesday, and you will arrive on Thursday or Friday. I'll come up on Friday and catch you up'. They set off and went up. He prepared himself and went up on Friday. They arrived. (86) When they arrived, Səttiye died. On the third day Səttiye arrived in the village and died. They slaughtered sheep[12] and went up and buried her in the morning. (87) The young children were playing with čəkke ('anklebones'), as we call them. What is the meaning of čəkke? We used to play like that. They are from sheep, the feet of sheep. Farxo said 'I also shall play with you'. He was young. (88) They said 'No. You go down to the house of the king. The daughter of the king has died. They have slaughtered sheep, bring us some of the anklebones (of the sheep) for us to play with'. He said 'Which of them?' They said 'The young one Səttiye has died'. (89) He did not go down to the house. The people were waiting for him. The assembly of the king was waiting for Farxo to come. He went down to the cemetery. He went down to the cemetery and among the graves he saw which of them was a new grave. (Whilst sitting) on it, he sang and sang and sang, then the grave opened. (90) The grave opened and—God forfend—he fell into it. No sooner had he lain down over her than also he died there. They waited for him until Saturday. On Saturday morning they set off (to find him) but there was no Farxo or anything (associated with him to be found). (91) Somebody said 'I have heard a voice in the cemetery, singing, perhaps he has gone to the cemetery'. They went up and found the open grave with him also dead in it. They buried him there. We have left it there and come here. Thank you.

(1) Now we shall begin the story of Mămo and Zine. Mămo was in ʔAlān and Zine was in Jazire Bota. The jinn of heaven made a plan. They gathered together and said 'We want to find a very handsome boy and a very beautiful girl. (We want) both to come together. We shall bring them together and marry them'. (2) Now, they sat down and made a plan. They saw Zine in Jazira Bota and Mămo in ʔAlān. They started arguing with one another regarding whom to take to whom. 'Should we take Zine to Mămo or Mămo to Zine?' They said 'No, a woman is treacherous. She will have her husband killed. Let us take Zine to Mămo'. (3) So, at night they seized Zine and brought her, they took her to Mămo. They took her to Mămo. They slept. She woke up and pushed Mămo (out of bed). She said 'Why have you come and slept in my bed?' (4) He said 'Woman, it was not me who came to sleep in your bed. It was you who came to sleep in my bed. If I have come to sleep in you bed, call your servants, your maids, their names are Šalem and Surma. Call them! If they answer you, then indeed it is me who has come to you. If they do not answer you, you have come to me'. (5) She called Šalem and Surma, but they did not give her any reply. She began to weep. Mămo stood up and called Bangina his servant. He said 'Bangina, you are a very honourable person. I don't want anything from you. Bring a lamp in your hand and come here to me. (6) Look at this beautiful girl, who has fallen asleep with me, so that tomorrow, if I speak (about it), I shall not be considered a liar and you will give your consent to say "Yes, it is true, there was a girl sleeping with him."' (7) He came and brought a lamp in his hand. He entered and saw Zine with Mămo. Bangina returned. His servant returned and went to his room. What did they do? They exchanged rings and scarves (pledging themselves to one another) until the day they died. (8) They both slept. He put a dagger and a sword, one opposite the other, so that they would not touch each other. In the morning, the jinn came and took Zine, took her away to Jazira Bota. (9) Mămo awoke and got up, but like a madman. He did not see the girl who had been with him. He only found the scarf and the ring on his hand. He said 'Where should I go? Who should I look for? Who should I ask so that I can find out where she has gone and who has taken her away?' (10) He came and sat down in front of the door of the house. His father came. He said 'Ah, my son, Mămo, why are you sitting (looking so) sad?' He said 'Father, the situation is like this'.

(11) He said 'This night a girl came and slept with me. I got up in the morning and did not find her. I don't know where she has gone'. He said 'My son, don't listen, they are little demons, they make themselves (into things) in the daytime (and make themselves) beautiful at night and come into the dreams of young men like you'. (12) He said 'They would come also into my head when I was young. They would come into my dreams. It is a dream, it is a vision, not (anything else)'. He said 'Father, but whose is this ring and scarf? Here is a ring and here is a scarf. How can I make myself lie and say that they are not real?'[1] (13) His father was confused. He said 'What should I do now?' He got up. The father of Mămo was an important man, he was an elder. He spoke to the people (there) and brought horsemen, three hundred horsemen. That is horses and people on their back. (14) He said 'Go and at every day's stage (of the journey) a hundred of you will return. You will say "We have not reached Jazira Bota. We do not know where it is."' Three hundred horsemen went off. Every day a hundred returned. Everyday a hundred returned. (15) The three hundred horsemen returned and said 'We have not found where Jazira Bota is'. Mămo himself was forced (to go). He sat on the back of his horse, he and his servant.

(16) They came along the road. They came along the road a long way. For two or three days they were on the road without food and without drink. The servant Bangina said to Mămo, he said 'My lord, where are you going? We have killed ourselves these three days and three nights. Neither are we eating nor are our horses eating'. (17) He said 'Sit down. Let's rest a little. We shall pray to the Lord God for us to find where the road is'. Now, they sat for a while. They began talking, and so forth. They ate something and gave their horses some food. (18) Now, the servant said to the master, he said 'My lord, where should we go?' He said 'We shall go to find where Zine is. But we do not know where she is, in what place she is, what the road is'. He said 'I cannot come with you in that case'. The servant got up and returned. Bangina returned. He (Mămo) remained alone. (19) He began to think. He was (immersed) in this musing for three days without eating or drinking or sleeping. (Finally) sleep stole him away and he slept. Jinn came and took him. They took him away and put him on the mountain of Jazira Bota.

(20) When Zine went away, when she went home—she had a sister, Səttiye, (there were also) Naze and Zine, they were three sisters. Səttiye was the oldest one, Naze the middle one and Zine the youngest. (21) She said to her sisters 'My sister Səttiye, you take this ring of mine. I have a fiancé, but I cannot put it on my hand. I have a fiancé, whose name is such-and-such', and so forth. (22) She took the ring. Zine put it on the hand of Səttiye, her sister. She was married to Qarateždin. Now, when he (Mămo) came down (from the sky) and came to the top of the mountain, the sun shone on him and he said 'May your name be praised, Lord God, who have brought me here together with my horse'. (23) He said 'I think this is the town. I'll go down and ask what town this is'. Now, he went down to the spring. He and his horse went down to the spring. He saw some girls there. He greeted them. (24) They said 'Welcome. (You have come) from there to here, Mămo!' He said 'From where do they know my name?' He was surprised. What did he do? He said 'I'll ask'. There were there three other girls, those of Băkurku the corrupt Jew. He had a lot of land. He was the servant of Mir-Zandin. (25) Mir Zandin said 'His daughters will go (and get married), he will die and his land will remain for me'. His daughters were by that spring. They had heard about Mămo from Zine, since they were the servants of Zine'. (26) He said 'Let me ask you[2] something. What town is this? They said 'This is Jazira Bota'. 'Is this Jazira Bota?' They said 'Yes'. He said 'Where can I lodge as a guest?'[3] They said 'If you are a good man, with Qara Teždin. If you (have come) with the business of a prince, with Mir-Zandin. If you have come to fornicate, then with our father Băku'. (27) 'Oh' he said 'May you be cursed! It would have been better if I had not asked you'. He mounted the back of his horse and went off. He went up and said 'Wherever my horse stops, (I shall stay) there'.…What time is it? It is seven in the morning. (28) He went up…He stopped before the door of Qara Teždin. The palace of Qara Teždin was on the mountain. He could see all the town. He went up and his horse stopped there. He struck the sides of the horse so that the horse would move from there. The horse did not move. (29) He dismounted and took the horse of Qara Teždin. He pulled it from the grass he was eating and tied his own in its place, then went up. He went up and knocked on the door. He went up and knocked on the door and Səttiye came out.

(30) When Səttiye came out, she saw him and her heart was broken.[4] She began to faint[5] and he caught her. Slowly he took her and put her on the bed. (She fainted) because Mămo was handsome. He put her on the bed. Then Qara Teždin said to her 'Make something light (to eat) for this worthy guest of ours. I'll just go down to the town to bring food and come back'. (31) Qara Teždin set off and went down to the town. She got up and made coffee. She brought the coffee and served it. His eye fell on his ring. He said 'Ah! She is married, and I did not know'. (32) They are sisters, you see, and they resemble one another. He said 'She is married and I did not know'. He got up and did not drink the coffee. He sat on the back of his horse and went back down to the spring, the spring to which he had come previously. (33) Qara Teždin returned home and said 'Ah, wife, where is the guest?' She said 'By your head, what should I say? I prepared coffee for him and served it, here it is. As you drank, he also (was treated) in the same way'. (34) 'But why, why? Did you not say something to him?' And so forth. She said 'By your head, what should I say, Qara Teždin?'. He said '(How could it be that) I am Qara Teždin, the collector of taxes and the like of the people of Botan, and a guest comes like this into my house and leaves without me knowing where on earth he was going! I (have the power) to drink water (even) from the clouds.' (35) He mounted his horse and went after him, went after him to the spring. He said to him 'Hey, my friend, why did you leave my house? Why had I gone down (to the town)?' He (Mămo) said 'Go up, my friend, the sun has risen and (when) it has set, it will not shine (again)'.[6] (36) He did not know (what he was talking about). He went up and said 'I'll go up and work it out'.[7] He said (to himself) 'Go up and work it out'. He went up and said to his wife, he said 'He said this to me, this, what do you say?' (37) She said 'Go down and say to him "The sun has just risen, sunshine has struck the mountains, but the sunshine has not yet completely (spread)"[8] Just tell him this and return'. Qara Teždin did not know what the meaning was. The woman went off. He went down and said to him, he said 'My friend, the sun has just risen, but the sunshine has not struck the mountains'.

(38) Mămo was forced to return. He returned and said 'What is going on?' He said 'Your ring, this ring is mine'. She said 'It is yours, yes. My sister, Zine gave it to me. She said "I cannot keep it on my hand". I took it and put it on my hand. (I wish) that she would be married to you'. (39) Qara Teždin said when he heard this, he said 'We are three brothers, Qara Teždin, Čəkko and Səppo. You also should become (one) of us and (make) four brothers. But I must first take the sister of Mir Zandin to marry her to you'.

(40) Now, he came and he went up onto the roof. He went up onto the roof to show him Jazira Bota. Zine and her maid-servants went down to the spring. Mir-Zandin said 'She (Zine) is going down to the spring'. He said 'Go down and meet her'. He (Mămo) said 'No, you go down to meet her'. Mămo said 'You go down to meet her'. He said 'No, you go down to meet her'. A word is beautiful in the mouth of its master.[9] (41) Mămo got up and sat on his horse. He went down to the spring. Zine came. Forty bridesmaids were with her. She came. He took her scarf in his hand and did this (with) the ring,[10] and she saw it. He greeted her. (42) She let his greeting go over her head.[11] She came and he said 'Give me a bowl of water'. She got up and gave him a bowl of water, and he drank. He drank and she sent them away, she sent all the maid-servants away. She said 'Go up to the house'.

(43) They remained there and had fun together. They had fun together and he said to her 'Go up and tell your brother that today they should make a plan to go out hunting. Then, I shall go to you at home'. She said 'I have seen in my dream that my brother will seize you and put you into a cell, in jail'. (44) He said 'I don't care about a cell. Your brother cannot put me in a cell. You go up and say to him that tomorrow they should go out hunting and I shall come to you'. She got up and said to her brother, she said 'Brother, I would like you to go up and hunt for wild sheep, you to go and bring me wild sheep'. (45) He says 'Sister, I don't think you have ever requested such things are you are requesting now'. She said 'Brother, I'd like it'. he said 'By all means'. Now, the next day he gave word and they went up. (When) they went up the mountain, it began to be overcast and rain. Mămo went up to the house, to the palace of Mir-Zandin.

(46) When it started raining, Mir-Zandin sent a servant. He said 'Go down and tell Zine to prepare the living room. We have returned, we could not go out hunting, it is raining'. He came down and (found) Mămo and Zine kissing each other. He came (into the house) and said 'My lord, let each other go! Mir-Zandin has come back'. He sat like this on the sofa. (47) At that time all aghas and elders wore the abbaya gown. He put the abbaya over them. He hid her, Zine, behind him. He (Mir-Zandin) entered (and said) 'Greetings'. 'Greetings to you too'. He (Mămo) accepted his greetings while sitting on the floor. (48) He (Mir-Zandin) said 'Are you not ashamed!? A prince like me greets you and you are sitting on your bum! Why have you not got up?' He said 'My lord, it shameful for you to say "bum" in the reception room. Don't say "bum" in the reception room. (49) Qara Teždin stood up and said 'Ask, perhaps he has a stomachache, perhaps he has a headache, perhaps he has a pain somewhere. Why (treat him) in this way?' He sat down. When Qara Teždin got angry, Mămo shouted at him 'Qara Teždin, you and I are brothers, half-brothers,[12] as they say. Come put your hand in my hand. Let me tell you something. (50) Now, Qara Teždin went and put his hand in the hand of Mămo. Mămo took the locks of Zine and put them in the hand of Qara Teždin. Qara Teždin knew that Zine was behind him. He had put his abbaya over her. He got up, annoyed, and went off. (51) He said to his wife, Səttiye, he said 'Səttiye, the situation is like this. Mămo and Zine are in a predicament. Let's set fire to the house. Let's burn our house so that there will be a cry for help and everybody will come to put out the (burning) house. Mămo and Zine will escape from the house'. (52) She said 'If it is like that, let even the baby remain in the cradle and also the Qur'an, but burn everything'. He said 'No, don't say that. Bring the baby and the Qur'an out and we'll set fire to the house'. The house of Qara Teždin consisted of seven storeys, seven rooms. Now, he set fire to the house. He set fire to the house, it began to burn and there was a commotion and call for help.

(53) Mir-Zandin said to Bakurko, who was a lying Jew, he went out and said, Mir-Zandin said to him, look, what noise is that? He went out and saw that the house of Qara Teždin was burning. He (the Jew) said 'My lord, it is nothing. It is a dog fight and children are watching it and shouting below'.

(54) The house of Qara Teždin was burning, but he lied and said 'It is nothing'. There were shouts for help and a cry. He said to his servant, who had come from the hunt, he said to him 'Go out and see what is happening. When he went out into the doorway, he saw that the house of Qara Teždin was burning. (55) He said 'My lord (I swear) by your head, not once, but seven times, that the house of Qara Teždin has burnt down. Qara Teždin is his brother-in-law, that is Qara Teždin had married the sister of Mir-Zandin.[13] Then Mir Zandin was angry and kicked the side of Bakurko and his shoe fell off. They went for help. (56) A while passed with this and that (happening). He said 'Well, Jew, dirty, cursed dog, for how long will you lie? The house of Qara Teždin is burning and you say that it is a dog fight. Go and get my shoe!' (57) He went to bring his shoe and saw Zine and Mămo talking together. He said 'Give me something to eat so that I am not a thorn in your foot'.[14] He said 'Now, blind man, what can I give you? If you were in my country, I would give you whatever you wanted. But, I have come to your country. You must help me.' (58) He said 'Curses, I'll be a thorn in your foot'. He said 'Go! Nothing can be done with you, you dirty Jew'. He drove him out and he went away. He went off, and the people began to extinguish the house of Qara Teždin. (59) His sister Səttiye, Zine sent gifts to Səttiye her sister, now that their house was burnt down, and other things, since she no longer had anything. She sent them to her and people came and rebuilt his house, in six or seven days, since Jazire Bota was a large community. They rebuilt his house, one or two rooms, and he dwelt in them. (60) The next day Bakurko went back and said to Mir-Zandin, he said 'I'd like to tell you something. It is indeed true, believe me'. He said 'What is it? You liar Bakurko, tell me'. He said 'Mămo loves Zine'. (61) There are two of such (women called) Zine. One is his sister and one is his wife. Mir-Zandin thought (he was talking) about his wife. He did not think (he was talking about) his sister. He did not say 'He loves your sister'. He said 'He loves Zine'. Now, we do not know (by this statement) which Zine (was meant). (62) He said 'The wife is honourable, she does not have such affairs, I know this'—and so forth. Bakurko said 'If it is not so—they are sitting playing chess, revealing secrets to one another, if it is not so cut off my head and also let my property be yours'.

(63) This Bakurko had a lot of property. He was a Jew. He had three daughters. Now, he called for Mămo and he came and sat in the reception room, and everybody else sat down in the reception room. They began playing chess. They played three times and Mir-Zandin lost[15] and was unable to beat Mămo. (64) He said 'What should I do with this man, Bakurko?' He (Bakurko) ran up and said to Zine, whom Mămo loved, he went up and said 'Zine, what are you doing here? Go and look out of the window. See your brother and Mămo who are sitting playing chess, the crowd that is gathered there, and so forth'. (65) She got up, looked through the window and saw the back of Mămo (turned) towards her, his back was (turned) towards her. He went down and said to Mămo and Mir-Zandin, he said 'My lord, may I humbly suggest you change places.[16] Change places'. (66) When they changed places, Mămo's eyes fell on the window and (saw that) Zine was sitting in the window. He began not to pay attention to the chess. He began to look at Zine. Mămo lost. Mămo lost three rounds. He said to him, he said 'My suffering is not from this (game), my suffering is from that one at the window. She has killed me and made me lose'. (67) Bakurko said 'My lord, don't give your ear to such people speaking'. He said 'She is asleep in the bed upstairs, in ostrich feathers. She is my betrothed'. Qara Teždin stood up. They wanted to kill Mămo. Mir-Zandin got up and wanted to kill him. (68) Qara Teždin himself said 'I am Qara Teždin. I have three brothers. We are half brothers. Whoever of you touches Mămo, we shall scatter his blood[17] from here until the palace of the prince'. (69) His brother čəkko stood up after him and said 'I am mad Čəkko. I have bought this sword of mine for a hundred gold coins. Whoever of you moves and strikes Mămo, I'll chop up his head and cut off his legs, hands and head'. (70) His third brother Səppo stood up. He was more mad (than the others). Nobody dared speak to him in the reception room. Mir-Zandin was annoyed. He went up home. (71) He said to his mother, he said 'Mother, today the three brothers of Qara Teždin became angry'. She said 'Why, my dear'. He said 'The situation is like this'. She said, my son, he has not come after your wife. He has come (since) he loves your sister. Your sister loves him.

(72) Before the eyes of these people of Botan, send them (his relatives) off to collect taxes and keep him for a year in prison. Before they return, release him from prison. Marry your sister to him. He is, moreover, the son of a king, he is a great man and a handsome man. Why won't you give your sister to him?' (73) He called and said 'Qara Teždin, Čəppo and Səppo', he said 'Come'. He said 'Go and collect the taxes of the people of Botan and I shall give my sister to Mămo'. They said 'If we go, don't harm him, don't touch him'. He said 'No'.

(74) They went away for a year. When they had gone, he put Mămo into a cell. A cell is a prison, a jail. He put him there, from day to day until a year had passed.[18] Then they came back. Qara Teždin, Čəkko and Səppo, the three of them came back to the door of Qara Teždin. Səttiye went up onto the roof. She saw that three horsemen had come to the door of the house. (75) While still on the roof she said 'Qara Teždin from the day that you went away to collect taxes, to collect money for Mir-Zandin, from that day he has held Mămo in prison, until today'. The three of them went, they did not rest but went to the house of Mir-Zandin. (76) They said 'We shall kill you right now. You have no chance. We shall kill you now'. 'But why?' They said 'We said that you should not touch Mămo. From the day that we went away you have held him in a cell, in prison'. (77) They said 'You must release him now and marry your sister to him, otherwise we shall kill you right now'. Bakurko said 'Why should we go down and release him? Let Zine make herself elegant, put gold on her, put on festive clothes and take forty bridesmaids with her. Let her come down and bring them out (with her) and we shall hold the wedding here'. (78) He said 'That's true, Bakurko'. She got up. She busied herself, speaking to her forty maid-servants, preparing herself. He, Bakurko, took himself off and ran down to Mămo. He said 'Mămo, Mămo, I said to you give me something to eat, but you did not give it to me. Now your brothers—you used to say "my brothers"—it has been a year that they have been here but have not asked for you. Now Zine is going to come with forty bridesmaids. She is going to say goodbye to you and marry somebody else'. (79) He did not believe at first. He said 'Let her marry, I am not the only man. There are those who are better men than me, more handsome, better men'. He did not believe it, until he saw the girl coming.

(80) Then, over here,[19] Zine pleaded to God and said 'Oh God, let him be well until I reach him'. Zine came down near to the prison and he saw her and forty girls with her. She was coming towards him, and he then believed Bakurko. (81) He said 'She is coming now to say goodbye to me'. He struggled (to move). He had been tethered with chains on his shoulders. He struggled to release himself. The chain went into the veins of his neck and cut them. He fell down. Blood started flowing from his neck. (82) She quickly entered (and found) him. She said 'Do not struggle. I have come to bring you out of the prison'. He said 'You have not come to bring me out of the prison. You have come to take my spirit from me'. She said 'No! I have come to bring you out'—and so forth—'Don't struggle!' (83) He spoke thus and died. When he died, she began to cry in lament and weep, cursing her brother and Bakurko. They came and there they all lamented and sang (dirges) over his coffin. She said 'Let his coffin be red and white. Mămo died in the morning and I shall die in the evening'. (84) She began to lament over him like that. She said 'It was Bakurko who was the cause'. She said 'Bring him to me'. They brought Bakurko to her. (85) Before he went up he said to his daughters, he said 'Listen. Now I shall go up and Zine will give me poison to drink and burn me. After she burns me, take the ashes and keep them. (When) Zine dies and they put her with Mămo, both together, put this ash on them and then leave it alone'. (86) Bakurko went up, he went up to Zine. Zine said 'Why did you do this?' He said 'I did not do anything'. He said 'I just talked, I did not do anything. I did not kill him'. She said 'Give him a bowl, a bowl of water. Fill it with poison and give it to him'. (87) They gave him poison (one bowl) after another, until he fell. They put petrol on him and burnt him. His daughters came, took the ashes, put them all in a cloth and put them aside. She began to ask God to let her also die. She became ill. She did not eat. They began to weep. (88) Her brother Mir-Zandin came and said 'My sister, do not weep any more. Do not mourn any more. Whoever you love, I'll give you to him. Say, I'll give you to him'. (89) She said 'After Mămo I don't love anybody and don't you speak to me. Do not speak! I don't love anybody. I shall die after (the death of) Mămo'. She began to lament and strike herself. She began not to eat, until she also died. Death befell her also.

(90) They put them in the grave both together. The daughters of Bakurko went up and spread the ashes over their grave. A pair of poplar trees sprang up. A pair (of trees) grew over them. (91) There is a hole in the grave. There is a chopper, a chopper to cut wood. A wild vine grows up and winds around those two poplar trees. The first to see the vine growing on those (trees) cuts it down. That place remains to this day. I have left it there and have come here.

(1) Mərza Pămət had fought against his town. He was a powerful, tough man. He did not yield to the king. He went to the mountains. He went off to the mountains and engaged in robbery and brigandry and murdered people. He was very cruel. (2) He stayed only in the mountains. He lived in the mountains. He used to go out hunting and bring back birds and animals, bring back various things, bring them back home.

(3) One day he went out hunting and a lion met him. A lion met him and he went to attack the lion. He had a weapon. He had a powerful gun. He caught it and brought it back. He caught the lion and brought it back. He put it in the house. He had a villa. He had built a large villa with two storeys. (4) Some time went by. He went up and caught a bear. He caught all kinds of animals. He brought them all back to the house. He lived by himself in one part[1] and the animals in another part. (5) A fox got up and said 'I say to you everybody, all you animals' He said 'We are animals, that one is a human. We are enjoying ourselves here. He is all alone there and is not enjoying himself. One of us should become a leader[2] so that we can look after that person. (6) (Somebody) said 'You yourself', some said 'The lion', some said 'The bear', some said 'The tiger', some said 'You yourself'. He said 'Me?' They said 'Yes'. They said 'Your name is Ḥasan Aġa'. 'Ḥasan Aġa?' They said 'Yes. Ḥasan Aġa'.

(7) 'Ḥasan Aġa, what's your opinion?' He said 'Look, I'll tell you. That man who is alone needs a wife. We must go and bring him a wife. But here there conditions'. 'What is your condition?' He said to the bear 'Bear, I want you within a week to go and catch a sheep and take out the meat. Bring the meat here for us to eat. Take its skin to the goldsmith'. (8) He said 'Put a bell on every hair. Give it to them, otherwise I'll flay your skin. Within eight days you must bring back the skin like this (with bells)'. 'By all means, Ḥasan Aġa'. (9) The bear went off. The bear went on her way, saw a sheep and brought it back. They set to work. The bear was a cook, that is (she did) the cooking. The lion on one side and the tiger on the other side were the guards. The others, the other animals, were all in the house, without any job.

(10) Now, the bear brought that sheep back and they ate the meat. She (the bear) took the skin to the goldsmith. The goldsmith put a bell on every hair and brought it back. He brought it back and she (the bear) gave it to the fox. (11) He said to the bear 'Look! You wear that skin on you and I shall make you dance. We'll go into the town. I'll make you dance. You dance and shake yourself. The daughter of the king will come out onto the roof. (12) The simarxa bird will come and take her. It will take her in order for us to marry her to Mərza Pămət'. She said 'By all means, Ḥasan Aġa. Then they went off.

(13) The simarxa prepared herself. Do you know what the simarxa is? It is a kind of bird.[3] Then the simarxa went and circled over the town. The bear and the fox went slowly. The bear was walking. She (the simarxa) went in front of the door of the palace of the king and hid herself until the daughter of the king went onto the roof. She could look and see what was happening through the window. (14) Now, the fox was beating her (the bear), crying out. She was giving off her roar and he was singing along with her. Then, the daughter of the king came out onto the roof. (15) As soon as she came out onto the roof, the simarxa made towards her and brought her back to Mərza Pămət. Then there was an outcry '(Come) now!' and so forth and (people went) after the fox and after the bear. They ran off and reached the villa, the villa of Mərza Pămət.

(16) When they arrived there, they saw her (the princess) there with him. She fell in love with him and she became his wife. Some time passed, three or four months, (during which she was) with him. Everyday he would go up to hunt. He would bring back a tree on his shoulders. He was huge. (17) There were various kinds of birds on it, quails, doves, and many others. He brought them back for those animals to eat and he also would eat. She (the princess) also began to eat them. (18) After six or seven months the king said 'Whatever has happened to my daughter, I want somebody to bring her back. I'll give a lot of money to the person who brings her back.'. He was a king, you see. (19) An old woman of magic said 'I'll bring her back'. She said 'I'll bring her back and you will see her (again). But I have a fee'. He said 'Of course'. (20) Now, she sat in a pot. She would make pots and jugs, as we call them, move. That is, it was a helicopter of that time. She sat in it and came to the villa of Mərza Pămət. She hid her pot and came out of it.

(21) (She screamed) 'Oh, oh, oh' (They said) 'What is the matter with you'. She arrived at the villa. The lion was on one side and the tiger on the other side. Each shouted in turn and wanted to eat her. (22) Ḥasan Aġa, woosh his hand was on his pistol, he said 'What is the matter with you? Have you not seen a human being? What is the matter with you. Calm down, let's see who she is'. They greeted her and asked her saying 'Are you all right? What is the matter? (23) She said 'Nothing. I am a stranger here. I have no relative here and I want to come here with you and stay'. 'Come in!' She came in and stayed a month there. Now, she wanted to know how she could rescue that daughter of the king so that she could take her back. (24) She said 'Who of you is the overseer of this house? Ḥasan Aġa said 'Me. What do you want?' (She said) 'Look at her, look at her, she has (almost) died of dirt. She has not washed for six months. Go and one of you wash her!' (25) He said 'It is not our job. Go and wash her yourself!' She went and fetched her and slowly took her to wash her. She put her in the pot. Then she made her fly away and took her home. She took her to the home of her father. (26) Ḥasan Aġa waited for her to return, waited for her to return, but she was not there. They went after her to find her, but she was nowhere at all. She had flown and gone away. (27) Ḥasan Aġa said, he said 'Get up and prepare yourself bear'. She said 'How (will we act) this time?' He said 'I'll dress up and you make me dance, so that they will not say that they are (the same as) the earlier ones'. (28) Now, as soon as the daughter of the king sees that we are singing and dancing, she will quickly come up to the roof'. So, they went off. The fox dressed up in the skin, but the skin was big. He made a ringing in the mud and grime and arrived at the palace of the king. (29) The bear started yelling and roaring and screaming 'What is the matter? What is the matter? Come and see. A bear is making a fox dance. A bear is making a fox dance'. The daughter of the king went up onto the roof. The daughter of the king went up onto the roof, then the simarxa came, made towards her and took her away. (30) She took her away and she stayed in the house once again. 'Oh King, what do you say? Your daughter has gone'—and so forth. He said 'I'll give money to whoever brings her back, as I gave money before'. She (the old woman) said 'I shall bring her back. Just as I brought her before, so this time I shall bring her'. He said 'Are you sure that you will bring her?' She said 'Yes!' 'Go!' (31) She sat in her pot once again and went off. She went off and arrived near to the villa. She put the pot on one side. She came and went up like the previous time. 'Oh, I am dying of hunger'—and so forth.

(32) 'What is the matter with you? Where are you coming from?' 'I am coming from a faraway place. I want to stay with you'. He said to the lion 'Look lion' He took his pistol. (33) He said 'Look. You and the tiger, when that woman comes here, I want her to be turned over like this, upside down. Each of you hold one of her legs. If one of you goes after the other, I'll kill him.[4] While standing erect, you'll tear her apart and distribute her to these animals so that they will all eat her.' (34) She came jauntily, she came like the previous time. She came and arrived there 'Hey, where are you going'. She said 'I am so hungry, so, so much'. He said 'Are you hungry? Wait'. Woosh, they put their hand on her leg. They lifted her legs upwards and her head downwards. They held her and pulled her apart. (35) They pulled her apart and made her two. They chopped her up and the animals ate her. The other woman remained there. She had Mərza Pămət, she became his wife.

(36) Some time passed. What did the king do? He was forced to raise an army. He raised an army and took it to go to find his daughter. (Since) the animals were numerous, they just pulled apart whoever went there. They (the army) could not (prevail against them). Finally, Mərza Pămət was forced to take his wife and run away. He went up and hid in another place, together with his wife. (37) One day Ḥasan Aġa said to those animals, he said 'I wish to say something to you, but tell me the truth'. He said 'God forfend, if I became ill, what would you do?' (38) The bear said 'May God forfend you become ill. I'd put you in my arms and for twenty-four hours (a day) I'd do this to you, give you a cool breeze, and so forth. I'd treat you with medicine'. (39) The lion, in his turn, said 'God willing you will not become ill'. The tiger (said) likewise, all (said) likewise. But they were all fed up with him, since he mistreated them so much.

(40) One day Ḥasan Aġa pretended to be dead.[5] They did not dare leave him.[6] The lion said to the bear 'You are the cook. Go and make food. Kick him and see whether he is dead or not'. She came and went like this, she made herself trip over him and her leg hit him. (41) He got up and woosh his hand was on his pistol. 'It was you who were saying "I'd hold you in my arms and so forth", but you kick me!' (He said) this and that about her and, woosh, his hand was on his pistol.

None of them cooked food. The bear, who cooked, did not dare go and cook. (43) He remained like that, of necessity, until a rotten smell came from him. After that the lion came and kicked the carcass.[7] He lifted the carcass and threw it away.[8] Mərza Pămət said 'Well, each of you take yourself off and go to your own place'. (1) There was a (man called) Rustam. The name of his father was Zāl. He had gone up into the mountains to hunt. Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi came from Iran. He came into the mountains, found him and they fought together. Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi killed Zāl. He went to Iran and remained there. (2) Word reached his relatives that Zāl had been killed. Time went by, a long time, and a son was born to him. A son was born to Zāl, and after several years this son of his became a man, he grew up. He also went hunting. He went up hunting and it began to rain. It began to snow. (3) He together with his horse entered a cave. He sheltered from the snow, since the snow was heavy. He entered the cave, looked upwards and saw teeth. He looked downwards and saw teeth. He looked inside and saw a throat. (4) 'Ah', he said, 'This is the head of a person'. A fever seized him. He became ill and started shivering. He sat on the back of his horse and went down back home. His mother knew (about this). She said 'My son, what is the matter'. He said 'Mother, what should I tell you?'. (5) He said 'I cannot relate it to you. My heart has burst (with fear)'. She said 'What is the matter, my dear? Tell me!' She tries (to press him) 'What is the story?' (6) He said 'Mother, it started raining. I went up hunting, it started raining and so I went into a cave. I looked upwards (and saw) teeth. I looked downwards (and saw) teeth. (I looked) inside (and saw) a throat. My heart burst (with fear) and I am still feverish'. (7) She said 'My son, don't you know what that is?' He said 'No, mother, I don't know. What is it?' She said 'That is the head of your father'. He said 'What are you saying?!'[1] He said 'The head of my father?' He said 'Who was it who killed him?' (8) She said 'Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi. He came from Iran and killed him'. Now, if the head of his father is like a mountain and he has been killed by Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi, where could he go?[2] He said 'I shall go to take revenge for my father'.

(9) He sat on the back of his horse and set off. He went along for a long way and reached a village. He reached a village. His nephew Bejəm, was born at that time. At the time when his uncle went out to take his revenge, Bejəm was born. (10) They brought a big pan of milk and gave it to him to drink. They took forty yards of material and sewed it for him, but it did not reach his navel, since he was so huge.

(11) He said 'Where is my uncle?' They said 'Your uncle has gone to avenge his father'. He sat on the back of a mule and he also set off. He went along and caught up with his uncle in that village. He did not know his uncle. He did not know who his uncle was. He went along and his horse stopped by the horse of his uncle. His uncle was by himself by the well. (12) He began (speaking) 'Who are you? Who are you?' He (Bejəm) was naked. They attacked each other. His uncle fell before Bejəm, (although) Bejəm had just been born, since he was so huge. He said 'Now, I'll kill you'. He said 'Who are you?' He said 'I am the son of Zāl'. (13) He said 'Uncle! You are my uncle'. He said 'Get up. I shall not kill you. Get up'. He got up and they remained together. He said 'Uncle'. He said 'You, my nephew', he said 'you stay here. I'll go up. (14) Dewa Zar has come. Dewa Zar has come from the West. He has come like a star. He has settled beyond the village, in that valley over there, in that cave over there. I'll go up and find him, then I'll return'. (15) He said 'Uncle, how can it be possible for me to stay here and you to go up? I also shall go up with you' He said 'Where are you going with me? You stay here. I shall go up by myself'. He said 'It is not possible'. He said 'I'll tell you something'—his uncle is saying this, Rustam is saying it—he said 'I'll tell you something, nephew. Let's see whether you can bring your hands together like this'. (16) He moved his two hands like this and brought them together. He (with) the lace of his feet tied the hands of Bejən. He left Bejən with his hands tied. He went up. (17) When Rustam went up, he went up into the cave and found a beautiful princess, the daughter of the king of Morocco, whom Dewa Zar had taken and brought to the cave. She was plucking a louse (from his beard), each louse that was in it was as big as a bean. She put it on the ground and (struck) it, bang, with a washing board and killed it. (18) When Rustam went up, he saw the woman. The woman said 'If you are thirsty, here is water. If you are hungry, here eat'. He said 'Wake him. I have come to kill him'. (19) She woke him and he got up. When he got up and they started fighting with one another, he struck his sword into the neck of that Dewa Zar and he went down the slope. (20) As for Bejəm, his hands were tied. What could he do? Out of his fervour, he applied force and pulled the tether apart. He went and took the stock of a terebinth tree. He took it and broke off the branches. (21) He put it on his head and said 'Come on you so-and-so! You have killed my uncle. Where can you escape from my hands?' He went up to the cave. The wood, the terebinth tree was on his shoulder. (22) He went up and then he (Rustam) said 'Nephew, I have killed Dewa Zar. There is no need for you to come and do anything'. He took away the daughter of the king. He brought her with him and they set off. So, there was Bejəm, that girl and Rustam, Rustam son of Zāl.

(23) They went off to Iran. They went to Iran. They made inquires here and there. They arrived (in Iran and said) 'Where is he? In which village, in which town does Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi live?' He pitched his tent and tethered his horse there. They were two (men with) horses and also the girl with them. They remained there. (24) As for Rustam, he asked for Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi. Bejəm had nothing to do with this. Now, they (the men of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi) made an attack. Bejəm went first towards him, Bejəm went towards him, they made an attack and surrounded him. They surrounded him and caught him. (25) When they caught him, the daughter of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi said 'Give him to me. I know how to flay off his skin. Give him to me'. They gave him to the daughter of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi. (26) She took a male goat, a large goat and slaughtered it. She gave it to the servants. They cut it up and threw away its flesh. They inflated its skin. Its testicles were large. They inflated it and put it on the battle field.[3] (27) She said 'This is Bejəm. They have killed him. This is him'. They (the family of Bejəm) had large testicles. Now, Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi was waiting. What would they fight with? A spear. They would sit on the back of a horse and come and strike one another with a spear. (28) Rustam and Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi fought. They struck one another, they struck again and again, but neither fell. Rustam was injured. When Rustam was injured, he sent (for help), since he had no medicine. Bejəm was with the daughter of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi. She kept him with her, looking after him, in order to marry him.

(29) Now, he sent his horse and it went home. It went home and his mother and his wife there saw that the horse was without a rider.[4] As for his mother, she understood. She said 'Oh, he has sent it. He has fallen into distress. This medicine, I think, let's send this medicine to him'. (30) They sent medicine to him. At that time the wife of Rustam was giving birth to his son. (While) his wife was giving birth, some were saying 'She is giving birth now', some were saying 'No, in an hour', some were pulling on a peg, applying force, this and that, and the son of Rustam was born. (31) When the son of Rustam was born, what did they do? They gave him a taste of milk, they gave it to him to drink, they dressed him and so forth. He said 'Where is the horse of my father?' He began to talk. 'Where is the horse of my father?' (32) They began (to do as he said and) brought the horse of his father to him. He said 'Put me on its back'. They put him on the back of the horse and put the medicine in his hand. 'Off you go!'

(33) He travelled a long way and reached the tent of his father. He reached the tent of his father, but he did not know whether it was his father's tent or not. His horse stopped there. He tried to strike the sides of the horse, but the horse did not move. He had to dismount. (34) He dismounted and saw his father who was ill. He had fallen there. He seized him to beat him and said 'Would you kill my father, you accursed man?' He said 'Who are you?' He said 'I am the son of Rustam'. He said 'My son, would you also kill me?'. (35) He held him, then let go and gave him the medicine. He cured him and he became strong. Now, he set off and again challenged them[5] to fight. Everybody was assembled there. Each one sat on the back of his horse and went to throw spears. (36) They began (fighting) and threw (spears) in this way three times. The fourth time, he drove his spear into the chest of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi. He threw him on the ground and killed him. After he had killed him, all the others in his army were defeated and all went away. (37) The daughter of Tătar-i Sleman-i Səndi came with Bejəm. He took her and brought her back. The other girl, who was the daughter of the king of Morocco, Bejəm took her also and brought her back. The three of them came back, they came back home. I have left it there and come here.

A29 The Tale of Rustam (2)

Informant: Bənyamən Bənyamən ('Ɛn-Nune)

(1) A story that comes to my mind is called Rustam and Zāl, Rustam was the son of Zāl. These were mighty heroic warriors, their bodies were strong and huge. (They were) heroic warriors, nobody could defeat them.

(2) Now, they say of Rustam that when he slept, he would be asleep for three days and three nights, without getting up, without waking. His father Zāl had a person who used to cut his hair, called a barber. Zāl sat before his palace. The barber brought a ladder and placed it behind his shoulders. (3) Since he was so large, the barber's hand could not reach the head of Zāl. He would place a ladder on his back and climb up the ladder to cut the hair of Zāl. He cut his hair and looked at the head of Zāl. (He saw) that there were scars of enormous wounds. (4) He said to Zāl 'Zāl, what are these scars on your head? What are these wounds?' He said 'Now cut my hair! It is not your business'. (5) He said 'No, by God. If you do not reveal what these scars on your head are, what these wounds are from, when you are such a heroic warrior, and who broke your head, made wounds on your head…', he said 'If you do not reveal this to me, I shall not cut your hair'. (6) He threw his scissors down and said 'I shall not cut it'. He tried (to persuade him and said) 'Cut (the hair on) my head! The wall has ears'. He said 'No, by God. I shall not cut (the hair on) your head, even if you kill me. I shall not cut your hair, unless you tell me what these wounds are on your head'. He said 'I'll tell you. Come, sit down'.

(7) He said 'I used to love a girl, the daughter of Aprəsyaw, of such-and-such a place, which was a distant place'. He said 'I used to go to bring her back, but they did not give her to me. I used to go to bring her by force and we would fight. They also had warriors and heroic people. We used to fight. (8) These wounds are all from those battles, in which they struck iron balls on my head. I fled and came back. I could not bring back the girl'. (9) Rustam, his son, who was in the house, woke up and heard this conversation. When he heard it he became very angry, since he also was a strong warrior. Nobody in that land could defeat him. (10) He said 'Is there a warrior who could break the head of my father?' He went out in anger. When he went out in great anger, his shoulder hit the side of the door and the wall was demolished. Since he was so huge, the wall was destroyed.

(11) He went out and Zāl said to the barber 'You see! Didn't I say that the wall has ears? Rustam has heard and he will make trouble'. Rustam said to his father 'You must tell me where that girl is. Is there somebody who can break the head of Zāl while Rustam is alive?' (12) He said 'My dear, the story is like this. He related all of the story about that girl, told where the place was and who had broken his head. Rustam became very angry. He got up and went out. (13) He came back and took his horse. He put the saddle and the club on its back. At that time the club (gurza) was in use[1] rather than the sword. This was a long piece of wood, with a ball at its end, which was tar. It was called a gurza. He took this. (14) Nobody could lift that club of Rustam. Its weight was forty batmans,[2] that is the weight of that club of his was more than one hundred kilos. He went off and sat on the back of the horse. He went off and left the village.

(15) He had a nephew, whose house was at the bottom of the village. His name was Bežəm. He saw his uncle Rustam going off. He said 'Uncle, where are you going?' He said 'That is not your business'. (16) What was Bežəm doing? He was holding the top of a poplar tree and bending it down, young children were coming and going up the poplar, he was letting the top of the poplar go, the poplar was springing up and he was flinging the young children in all directions.[3] (17) Rustam said 'Nephew, don't do that and don't kill all those people'. He said 'There's nothing to worry about. Where are you going? He said 'I am going (since) I have a job. You go home!' He said 'No, uncle. I will come with you'. (18) He tried (to persuade him and said) 'Go back!' He said 'No. I will come with you'. He pulled up a poplar, put it on his shoulder and set off. Rustam looked and saw him pull up the poplar and put it on this shoulder. He said 'Either he will be a problem or he will be outstanding'. He was a young child in name (only). (19) They went off. They travelled for two or three days, they went and slept in a certain place. They were tired and they slept in a certain place. Now, when Rustam slept, he would be asleep for three days and three nights and not wake. He said to Bežəm, his nephew 'You must not sleep—but I shall sleep here—lest thieves come and steal the horse'. He said 'Fine'.

(20) Bežəm sat as the guard for his uncle, with the poplar tree in his hand, going back and forth, playing with the poplar tree, as if it were a walking stick, not a poplar tree. Then, when night fell, he saw something coming, rushing along on the back of a horse, as if ablaze, like lightning blazing with light, and people and we don't know what were with it. (21) That light, that fire, that thing appeared. He did not know whether it was a horse or whether there was a man on its back. It was night. He saw what seemed to be a fire, a light, and it went up and entered a cave in the mountain that was behind their backs. He (Bežəm) was there, but he could not oppose it. (22) He stood until when three days had passed, Rustam awoke. Rustam awoke and said 'Hey, nephew Bežəm, has anything happened? Thieves or the like?' He said 'Yes, uncle, the situation is like this'. (23) He said 'A light came in the night, coming up right here. I took this stick to strike at it, but nothing fell down, except for a few things that fell over there shining, I don't know what it is. It went up and entered that cave over there'. (24) He said 'What is it?' He went and saw that it was all gold and that some of the jewels that were hung around the neck of the girl had fallen on the ground'. He said 'Ha, you have no business with this. Stay here now. This is not your business. Stay here now while we go to see what it is.

(25) Now Rustam went up to the entrance of the cave. Bežəm said 'No, uncle, I will go up there with you'. He tried (to persuade him saying) 'You stay'. He said 'No. I will go up. You stay here. I will go up'. He was so obstinate. He was a young child, in name, but he was also a great warrior. (26) He went up to the cave. He saw a man asleep. He had put his head in the lap of a girl, a very beautiful girl. The girl said 'What are you doing here?' I have come to bring you down and take you away'. (27) She said to him 'Get up and go away, go down, lest he wakes up. If this man wakes—he is a great warrior—he will kill you'. He said 'No, by God. I shall take you down. If he is a brave man, let him get up and I shall challenge him'. (28) He woke up. When he woke up, he saw him. He tried (to persuade him to go) 'Go down, you are a young child. I have no inclination to kill you'. He said 'No, by God. Either I shall kill you and take this girl or I shall not go out from here'. (29) The man, who had kidnapped the girl, was forced (to act). He also was a great warrior. The girl was the one that Zāl loved. It was because of her that his head was all broken. He was a great warrior. He went and took her from her father and mother, he kidnapped her and carried her off. He brought her to that cave and hid her.

(30) Now, that warrior seized Bežəm. He tied his legs and hands and threw him from the entrance of the cave. He threw him from the entrance of the cave and he went down, rolling over as he went. (31) Rustam looked and saw his nephew rolling over. He put out his hands and caught him. He caught him and released his legs and hands. He said 'What is it?' He said 'The situation is like this'. He said 'Stay here, this is not your business. I shall go up myself'. (32) Rustam went up to the cave. He looked and saw that that man was there. When he (the other) saw him, he recognized him. He knew that he was Rustam. He knew that he was a hero, a great warrior, whom he could not defeat. (33) He tried to beg him (saying) 'I am your servant. Go, leave me! It is I who who have brought her. She is mine'. He said '(I swear) by your head and by the head of your father, this girl will not stay with you'. (34) He struck his club on the head of the man and killed him, then took the girl. He took the girl and brought her down, put her behind him on the back of the horse, set off and went to the land of the girl's father.

(35) The father of the girl was also a heroic warrior and he had many warriors—(they went) to another land. His name was Aprəsyaw. Bežəm said 'Where are we going uncle? Let's take her back to my grandfather, to my grandfather Zāl'. (36) He said 'No. I shall go and take her to her father. I shall ask him for her hand. If he does not give her, I shall kill him and take her by force, then finally I shall take her back'. This was because he was such a heroic warrior and did not want to play tricks. They travelled until they reached the land of girl's father.

(37) Now Rustam took the girl, put her on the back of the horse behind him and set off on the road. He said to his nephew Bežəm 'Let us go to the land of Aprəsyaw, the girl's father'. His land was far away. They travelled for days. (38) Bežəm, his nephew, said 'Uncle, have her wedded to you, she is for you'. He said 'No, nephew, no. She is betrothed to my father. I shall take her to my father. But let us go and ask her father for her hand'. (39) This is because they are tribes, they are heroic warriors, they cannot steal or plunder. He should go and ask her father's family for her hand and then finally bring her back to his father. On account of this girl, the head of his father Zāl was broken many times. (40) They travelled one day, two, three, until they reached the land of the girl's father. They reached a town. They pitched their tents, in a place near the town. (41) He said to Bežəm, his nephew 'You stay here and my horse will stay here, while I take the girl up to the house of her father. He held the hand of the girl and went up. He asked and the people showed him the house of the girl's father. They said 'It is this one'.

(42) Word got to the girl's father. They said 'Your daughter has been brought back'. Who has brought her back? They said 'A man has brought her back, but we do not know where the man is from, he is a great warrior'. (43) The girl's father went out to meet him. When he saw him, his body trembled and he was afraid. He said 'The person who kidnapped my daughter was a great warrior. All my armies could not defeat him. How could he by himself take the girl from him. He must be a heroic warrior'. (44) He was afraid. He (Rustam) went up and greeted him, then entered the reception room. The courtiers of the man and all his warriors were sitting in the reception room. They took the girl into a room. (45) They did not ask him where he was from. Those people did not ask a guest 'Where are you from?' They sat and they brought food, and they ate. The name of the girl's father was Aprəsyaw. (46) He said to one of his servants, he said 'When you bring coffee and you distribute it, put your foot on the pipe of that man and break it, break his pipe'. This was because they used to smoke a pipe, there were no cigarettes. They would fill a pipe with tobacco and smoke it. (47) Rustam smoked his pipe. He finished it and put it on the floor. They brought coffee and gave it to him. He took the coffee to drink. The man serving the coffee put his foot on the pipe and broke it. (48) When Rustam saw that his pipe was broken, he knelt down on his knees, put his hand on that coffee server, lifted him up and slung him onto the floor. The man died. When he did this, the chief of the land, of the town, Aprəsyaw, let's call him the 'headman',—his body trembled and he was very afraid. (49) He said 'He is a great warrior. I cannot defeat him. He will wreak havoc with us'. Nobody spoke. The man took him (Rustam) away and he lodged there. He lodged there and that night Rustam slept in their home. He was their guest. They laid for him bedding in a room and he slept. He slept for three days without getting up. They did not dare go and wake him.

(50) Bežəm was at the bottom of the village. What does he do? He goes to one side of the village and batters the houses with the poplar tree and destroys them all, at night, on the heads of the people, then he runs back. Before daybreak, he went to sleep in his tent. (51) Word got to the king. They said 'One side of the village is destroyed. He went down to investigate who had destroyed it. (They said) 'Where are the armies that have attacked us?' (52) They said 'Nobody has been seen, but we know that the houses have been destroyed and no armies have been seen'. On that day (he) had gone out. The next day Bežəm went to another side of the town. (53) Also on that day he battered the houses with the poplar tree that was in his hand and destroyed them and he destroyed the district. He then ran off and slept in his tent.

(54) Word got to the king. They said 'A side of the village, the town, has been destroyed'. He was very afraid and said 'Who has done this?' They did not know who it was.

(55) Finally Rustam woke up. He woke up and the king said to Rustam 'The situation is like this. What is happening?'[4] What tent is that in the field? Perhaps it was from here that all this devastation is being wrought'. (56) Rustam said 'I don't know what happened. I was asleep'. The king returned and sent an army to that tent. He went down to see what was in the tent. Bežəm came out. He took his stick, the stick was a poplar tree. He smote the army, he tore them apart and threw them in all directions.[5] (57) The king was afraid. He said this business is being done from here'. He said to Rustam 'Who is he?' He said 'He is my nephew. Why are they going down to fight with him?' He said 'If he is your nephew, why is he camped there and does not come here? Perhaps it is he who is destroying the houses'. (58) He said 'It is not him. If you have warriors and you want to fight—now, I have come to ask for the hand of your daughter, whether you want to give her or whether you fight is up to you'. He said 'No, by God. I will not give my daughter to you. I do not know where you are from'. (59) He said 'Do you not know me?' He said 'No'. He came down, they challenged one another to fight.[6] He went down to the field and said 'Whoever is a warrior, let him come here and test out his mettle'. (60) The king sent his warriors to wrestle with him. All those who went down there could not defeat him and he killed them. Rustam was a mighty warrior. (61) (Bežəm) was going back and forth. He said to his uncle, he said 'Uncle, leave them to me, those young people, leave them to me'. Rustam said 'No! Go and sleep in your tent. Let them be my concern'. (62) In the end, he was forced (to concede), since Rustam finished off all the armies of the king, nobody being able to defeat him. The king was very frightened. He sent after him and made a truce with him. He made a truce with him and said 'I want to know who you are'. (1) There was once[1]—nothing is greater than God—there was a man, who had two sons. He was in very straitened circumstances. He could no longer make a living.[2] He said to his sons 'My dears, go and search for a job for yourselves by which you may make a living. Which of you will go?' (2) They said 'The older one will go. He knows better how to manage things. You, the younger one, don't go', (speaking) to the younger one. His son went searching for a job in a town. He said 'Who wants a workman? Who wants a servant?' (Somebody) said 'Yes, I want a servant'. (3) He went to him and he employed him. He said 'Let me tell you something. Do you want to work?' He said 'Yes!' He said 'Work with me until the toḵe bird sings.[3] As soon as the toḵe bird has sung, your work will finish'. He said 'All right'. (4) He said 'What is the job?' He said 'Early in the morning take out the oxen and take them to that mountain over there. This hound, small hound, small dog, will be with you. Wherever she squats down, it is there that you should plough. (5) I shall provide you with a food-box of pitta breads. I shall provide you also with yoghurt. You should eat the pittas without breaking them and should eat the yoghurt without the crust being spoilt, the crust of its surface. (6) In the evening bring me a bundle of pieces of wood that are without bark, that are white without bark.' He said 'Very good'. (7) That servant of his got up early in the morning. He brought out the oxen, took them (with him) and went to plough together with a hound, a plough, and also yoghurt and pitta breads. (8) He reached the mountain and the hound went up onto a rock and sat there. He tried (to persuade her down saying) 'Come down here! I want to plough here. Why have you gone there?' But she did not come down. He was confounded. (9) He took the oxen onto the slope, he went up to plough on that slope, but the oxen could not manage and came back down. The plough squeaked (on the rock). (10) The poor man was busy there from morning until evening, but could not plough. He was shattered. He was very tired. The hound did not come down but went up onto the rock, that is the stone.

(11) Now he wanted to eat something, since he was hungry. He looks at the pitta breads, how can he eat them without breaking them? He must break them. As for the yoghurt, its crust could not be spoilt. (12) So he remained hungry. He did not eat and left the pitta breads where they were.[4] In the evening he seeks wood, searches for wood, but there is no wood without bark. He went back home. (13) He went back home and he (his master) said 'Well, what have you done?' 'I could not plough. The hound went up onto a rock and I could not plough. I could not eat the bread without breaking it. You told me not to spoil the crust of the yoghurt. So, I am dying of hunger'. (14) He said 'You have no use for me'. He struck him ten strokes, ten strokes of a stick on his back and drove him away. 'Go away, you are no use to me'. The poor man went away weeping.

(15) (His father said) 'My dear, what have you done?' 'This is what happened. I could not work with him. He did such-and-such to me'. His crazy (younger) brother said 'I'll go'. 'Don't go my lad. He'll kill you. He is a scoundrel. He beat me with ten strokes. He will kill you'. 'No, I'll go'. (16) That brother of his, the crazy man, went on his way. (He cried) 'Who wants servants? Who wants servants?' He went wandering near his house, crying out 'Who wants servants?' He said 'Come here. I want servants. Well, do you want to work?' He said 'Yes'. (17) 'Come, I'll tell you something. Do you want to work?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'You will work with me here until the day the ṭoǩe bird sings. When the ṭoǩe bird sings, your work is finished. What is your job?' (18) He said 'Take these oxen out in the early morning and take them to the mountain. Where this hound crouches, where this dog crouches, it is there that you should plough. He said 'Very good'.

(19) He got up in the early morning and went and took his oxen, with his plough on his back, together with the hound and a food-box containing pitta breads and yoghurt. He went off. (20) The hound went up on a rock. He tried (to persuade it down saying) 'Come down here! I want to plough here. Come down here!' It did not come down. He went up and took a stone, put the dog here, killed it and turned it upside down. Then he dragged it and said 'You will be here'. He ploughed there. He ploughed. He had killed it.

(21) He came to eat something. 'Pitta bread without breaking it, how could that be?' He had a knife with him. He scored the pittas in their middle. He scored both the pittas. He pierced the yoghurt. He pierced the vessel from below. He pierced it, the yoghurt came out from underneath onto the pittas and he ate the bread. He ate the pittas and the yoghurt. (22) In the evening what did he do? He searched for pieces of wood, white pieces of wood without bark. He looked and said 'I think it is only this plough (that has white wood). I'll break it up and take it to him. They are without bark'. He broke up the plough. He broke up its yoke. He reduced it to pieces. He tied them on his back and went off. He (his master) had said 'You should bring the oxen in through the window. I shall not be at home. I shall lock the door and go somewhere. You put them all through the window, don't bring them in through the door'. (23) He went up to the door of the basement stable. 'A window, where could an ox enter in a window? By God, what should I do with myself?' There was an axe there. He struck each ox a blow on its head, on its forehead and put it on the ground. He chopped them all up. He chopped the oxen up with the axe. He put them all through the window and put them in the basement stable. The landlord came back. He said 'What did you do with those oxen?' 'I put them in the basement stable'. 'These pieces of wood…why have you broken the yoke of the plough?' 'From where can I fetch white wood without bark? From where could I seek this for you?' (24) 'Wretch, what have you done! You have broken the plough! You have broken all the beams (of the plough). You have broken everything!' He said 'That's how it is'. 'And the pittas?' 'I have not cut them. Here are the pittas. As for the bowl (of yoghurt)—here, its crust is still on it'.

(25) He did not know that his oxen were slaughtered. He did not know. He went to sleep. In the early morning he heard the sound of cats. The cats were hissing in the basement stable. They had all come for the meat. Cats, it was a cat fight in the basement stable. They were pulling each other's hair out. (26) The wife said 'Husband, see what those cats are doing. Where have they come from? We did not have any cats'. All the cats of the village were gathered there. What was it (that they heard)? It was the hissing of cats. (27) He opened the door (and saw that) all the oxen were chopped up and put down on the floor. Then he got angry. What will he do to him (the servant)? He said 'What have you done?' 'I have put the oxen through the window! You said "You should put them through the window"'. The horns did not fit, so he brought also the horns. They were all dead.

(28) What could he do with himself? He said 'Well, they are dead, wife, what should we do?' He is mad. He is also a damned scoundrel.[5] Now, when will the ṭoke̯ bird sing? The ṭoke̯ bird will not sing right now. He said 'Let's see what we can do'.

(29) They had a married daughter in a distant place. Their daughter was married in another house. He said 'Take her portion (of the meat). She will say that "It is shameful. My father has slaughtered several pairs of oxen and has not brought my share."' (30) One (piece) was a shank, which was stripped (of its meat). Another was a thigh, which was in good condition. He said (to the servant) 'Take this thigh to her'. He said 'All right'. He went up and put the thigh near to the house and brought the shank which was all stripped. (31) He said 'This is your share of the ox. You father has sent it to you. She said 'From all the ox he has sent this shank! I don't want it! Go and take it away! Take it back!' (32) He went back down. He (the master) said (to himself) 'Now what has he done?!' (He said to him) 'Doesn't she want it?' He said 'No!' He said 'Take it up again. If she does not want it, hit her with it in the middle of her forehead'. He said 'All right'. (33) He went up a second time. He put down the large thigh outside and brought in the shank of the ox. She said 'Is this all?' He said 'This is your portion'. 'I don't want it. Take it back'. 'Don't you want it?' He twists the shank of the ox in the middle of her forehead and caused her to roll on the ground. He made her into a corpse. (34) He went back down (to the house). He said 'She was still not satisfied'. He (the master) did not know what had happened. He had killed her. He (the master) said 'Leave her'. Now they were perplexed as to what they could do with that man. They were very perplexed.

(35) The ṭoke̯ bird would not sing right now. Now, his daughter—they had a small daughter—he said 'Early in the morning go up onto that mulberry tree and call out, make a tuke tuk, tuke tuk sound, so that we can get rid of him, so that he will go away'. (36) His daughter went up onto the mulberry. It was still very dark. She made a tuke, tuk sound. He (the servant) said 'Is this a ṭoke̯ bird in this season? Where has a ṭoke̯ bird come from at this time? Is it the time of the ṭoke̯ bird?' (37) He said 'Four months, five months are left (before the time of the ṭoke̯ bird). Where is the ṭoke̯ bird from?' He said 'I'll bray her father. What kind of ṭoke̯ bird is this?' He took a small stone and threw it at her. She fell off from there and died on the spot. She fell flat and died.

(38) He got up (and saw) that his daughter was dead. He said 'What have you done?' He said 'I threw (a stone) at the to̯ke̯ bird. The to̯ke̯ was singing in this mulberry tree'. So, he even killed his daughter. By God, what will they do with that man?

(39) 'At night', he said, 'Take out this young boy, our young son and make him pass water at night'. He said 'All right'. He took him out and pricked a needle into his buttocks. He (the boy) said 'That's enough! That's enough!', four or five times. (40) He (the master) said '(If) he does not pass water, throw him against the wall'. The third time, he took him out, pricked him with a needle on his buttocks 'That's enough! That's enough!' He said 'Is that enough? Is that enough? Damn⁶ your father'. He flung him against the wall. (Their son was) a corpse and they were confounded 'He has destroyed the home'.

(41) They wanted to escape. They said 'Let's burn the house and get rid of this man. Let's go away. He will finish us off'. They said 'Let's flee. Today bake kade cakes. Let's put together a food-box for ourselves. Let's go to another town. We shall abandon the house and let him go away. After he has gone away, we shall return to the house'. (42) Now, at night, he was listening to what they were saying. He was on the other side. He had put up a mosquito net and was lying there, pretending to be asleep, while they were making a plan. (43) They baked kade cakes. They made a food-box and put it in a sack. (They made) kade cakes, so that they could go at night, get up in the night and go on their way. What did he do at night? He came and got into the sack of kade cakes. He put kade cakes on top of himself. He crouched down in the sack. (44) In the night he woke his wife 'Wife, get up. It is time for us to go. He (the servant) is asleep. Quietly, don't make a noise'. She said 'No (I won't make a noise)'. He loaded it (the sack) on his back. He said 'It is very heavy'. He said 'It is (full with) many kade cakes. They are very heavy'. (45) They went a long way and came close to a village. Dogs came towards them. Dogs came towards them. He (the servant) said 'Brother, brother, the dogs have bitten me'. 'Hey, you dog, son of a dog, I thought it was heavy'. (46) Now, on the way, he had urinated. The urine flowed down. He said 'They're oily! The kade cakes are oily. It ran down onto his clothes. He took it and licked it. He said 'What did you put in these kade cakes? They are all pure oil'. He (the servant) tried (to persuade them, saying) 'Let's not sleep here'. He (the master) said 'Let's sleep here'. (50) He said 'You sleep in the middle so that you do not roll down (into the river)'. His wife slept on one side and the husband on the other side. They put the servant in the middle so that they could take him in the night and throw him. (51) Now, they went onto that bridge. They said 'Let's sleep on that bridge. It is better to sleep on it, so that snakes and the like don't come. Here it is safer'. It was like our bridge over the Zab. They said 'We shall put you in the middle so that you do not fall at night'. (52) They slept on the bridge. They put him in the middle, with the husband on one side and the wife on the other, so that in the night they could take him and throw him into the river, into the Zab. He knows what is happening. He was listening to them. (53) He got up in the night. He rolled over her husband and put him in the middle. He came to be on the other side. In the early morning, when it was still very dark, he said 'Wife, it is time'. The wife got up on this side and the servant on the other side, they rolled her husband and threw him into the Zab'. (54) She said 'What have you done?' He said 'It is him'. He said 'Your husband has gone'. 'What have you done to me?! You have destroyed my home'. 'I have been waiting for you for a long time. (1) A man had gone up to the mountains to kill (wild) sheep, so that they (the hunting party) could return and sit together in a gathering, drinking, making merry and singing. He went up (in the mountains). He went up and at nightfall he came to a cave. He said 'I shall rest and go down in the morning'. It was night. (2) He said 'I shall rest here tonight. In the morning I shall get up and go down (the mountain). He went in and sat down in the cave. Then, at night, a giant came. The giant looked at him. That man's heart burst (with fear) 'He is a giant, what shall I do, for God's sake?' (3) He also was a man, but he was a different type. He said 'Oh God, oh Saint Zaya, oh Saint Zaya, I shall donate such-and-such a walnut tree to Saint Zaya, if he provides a way out for me, so that I can escape from the hands of this man'. (4) Now, he killed a goat, he killed a goat that was very large and said 'Roast it and give it to me, then I shall eat you. It is for me and you also are for me'. That is, he would eat also that man. (5) He said 'Oh God, oh Saint Zaya, find me a way out of this'. He slaughtered the goat. As soon as he (the other man had roasted it and) given it to him, he ate it all up. The goat was huge. He ate the goat. Then he put his hand like this and slept. The giant slept. (6) When he slept, he used to sleep for a week. 'Oh God, what shall I do? Oh Father of mercies, perform an act of mercy for me with this man'. He moved a little like this, he moved like this, but he (the giant) did not move. His eye was open, but he was asleep. (7) He rocked himself like this. He did this to himself. He dragged himself away. He (the giant) did not move. He slowly went out from the entrance of the cave. He was still the same, with his eye open, asleep. He loaded his gun well. He loaded his gun well, and shot it at his forehead, at his eye. Then he ran away. (8) From below he let out a cry. He let out a cry, and the poor wretched man urinated in his trousers (out of fear) and fled. He put all the fire (of the cooking) on top of him. The people were waiting to sit down in the meeting room, to make merry. (9) They were waiting and (when he came in they saw) that his gun was smoking. They said 'What is the matter with you poor soul, Xarəpša? What is the matter with you?' He said 'Don't ask![1] God has saved me'. 'What was it?' He said 'A giant'.

A32   THE FOX AND THE MILLER

Informant: Awiko Sulaqa ('ʿEn-Nune)

(1) There was a miller, a miller who looked after a water-mill. Everything the mill produced he ate. A fox came and said 'My brother, let us become brothers, you and I. Let us become brothers'. He said 'How can we become brothers? You are a fox and I am a human'. (2) 'We shall operate this mill, we shall work and eat together you and I. I shall go up into the mountains and bring back blackbirds and quails, I shall bring back things like that from the mountains. We shall come here and cook them and then we shall eat them, you and I together'. (3) So they became brothers. They became brothers, and one day, two, three, a month, a year (passed). The fox said 'I shall go up to the king of this village and ask for his comb'. He said 'What will you do with a comb?' 'What business is it of yours?—he said this to his brother—'What business is it of yours?' He said 'Go up, my brother'. (4) He went up and brought a comb. He threw it down and said to the king 'I want this comb of yours. The people of the village have all gathered to comb wool'. There was really no wool, nothing, it was lies. 'All the people are fed up, combing from morning until now. I have put the wool in store rooms'. (5) The king said 'Oh God, I who am the king of this town—this town has not such a thing. Where is it from, where have you acquired such a thing?' It was all lies! A week went by in this way, then he went up again. (6) He said 'King, give me again the comb to comb goat's hair, my goat's hair'. 'Where has that person got goat's hair from?' He went down and in the evening he brought up some goat's hair and put down the comb. (7) He said 'The people are fed up with combing so much from morning until now. One hundred or two hundred people were combing goat's hair'. He was amazed. The king was amazed and said 'Such a thing as this cannot be'. (8) After a month, he came up again to the king. He said 'King, may you be healthy, please give (me) your grain measure so that I can measure my money'. With a grain measure they measure wheat, that is what it was for. 'So that I can measure my money and see how many measures (it amounts to)'. (9) He said 'I am the king of this town and I do not have such money. Where has he got so much money from, that he measures the money with a grain measure?' Well, he gave it to him and he went down. 'The people are fed up, all the community are fed up, they are all measuring money in the storerooms'. It was lies. There was nothing.

(10) After a month he said 'Brother'—to his brother the miller, he was a miller in a water-mill—'I shall go and ask for the hand of the king's daughter for you, brother'. 'What shall I do with the king's daughter? What shall I do with her? She is the king's daughter and I am a miller'. (11) He said 'I shall go up, leave it to me'.[1] He went up. He put a stick over his shoulders and went up. He pulled up the chair of suit, the chair of suit, asking for the hand of a woman. He (the king) said 'What is it?' He said 'I want to ask for the hand of your daughter for my brother'. (12) He said 'I have given her to you' He said 'When will the wedding be?' He said 'After a week'. He went down and said 'Brother, I have asked for her hand. He (almost) died of his grief and sadness 'What could she be to me, for God's sake!? What shall I do with her, the king's daughter?' (13) Night fell, eight days passed. They brought up the drum and the pipe, there was danci ng and singing. They brought the king's daughter. He said 'You come after me, as I go down. Come after me. Let the wedding party come down after me'. (14) He went down a long way and came to a flock of sheep, in which there were two or three thousand head of sheep. He called the shepherds and said 'Whose are those sheep?' They said '(They are the sheep) of so-and-so'. (15) He said 'I only say to you this, if they say to you "Whose are those sheep?", say "They are (the sheep of) Ajdən the fox. I do not want anything from you. They are yours. Just say "Ajdən, the name of Ajdən the fox"'. He gave himself the name of Ajdən. (16) The wedding party came and the king came, coming down (the mountain). They said 'Whose are those sheep?' They said '(They are the sheep) of Ajdən the fox'. He said 'My daughter is lucky. These numerous sheep have become hers'. (17) He (the fox) went down with them (following) behind him. He came to a flock, a herd of buffaloes and cows. He said to the shepherd—what did the fox say? He said 'Whose are these'. He said 'They are mine'. 'Say, if they come down here, some people (come down) here, if they ask you "Whose are these?", say "Well, these belong to Ajdən the fox"'. He got away also with these (lies).[2] (18) The people whom he had mentioned came (and said) 'Whose are these?' He said '(They belong) to Ajdən the fox'. The king was happy. He said 'From where could I acquire such wealth? I am the king of a land and I do not have such wealth. From where does he get his wealth?'

(19) He said 'Follow me further'. They went down and came to a herd[3] of camels. Formerly, if you want to know the truth, all (riding animals) were camels. They would go around on the back of camels. There were camels everywhere.[4] (20) He said 'Whose are they?' He called the shepherd. 'If somebody comes and asks saying "Whose are they?", say they belong to Ajdən the fox'. The people came down and, when they arrived, they said 'Whose are they?'. He said 'They belong to Ajdən the fox'.

(21) He went on down, he went down to Leliθa. The fox shouted 'Help!'. She came out to listen. 'They want the blood of a fox and the blood of Leliθa. They will kill us to inject it into the son of the king, who is afflicted with leprosy. The son of the king is afflicted with leprosy, they will inject (our blood) into him and he will be cured'. (22) Leliθa came out and listened. She said 'What did you say? What have I to do with you?' 'I have come to tell you to hide yourself'. 'What shall I do? 'Look, the people are coming, they are coming towards me'. She said 'What shall I do?' She said 'What shall I do?' and he said 'You have a heap, a heap of leaves, a big heap'. He said 'I shall hide you in it'. (23) He took away (the leaves), from here and from there,[5] put her inside and built up all the leaves around her. He built them all up. He said 'However much rustling sound there may be, don't move. The army is passing by'. He lit a fire in twenty places. She said 'I am getting hot!' He said 'They have almost passed'. He burnt her, made her a corpse, killed her. (24) He went into the cave of Leliθa. There were even spoons of gold, forks of gold, tea cups of gold! All belonged to Leliθa. This is what they say.[6] They (the wedding party) were dancing and singing, eating and drinking. The fox went up to make an announcement. (25) He said 'Whoever has eaten with a spoon, with a knife, in a vessel or cup, everybody may take it for himself and take it back up (to their home). I don't want them anymore. I don't want them anymore'. (But in fact) they did not belong to his father. The wedding lasted eight days there. They ate and drank and then went off back up (the mountain).

(26) They went up and the fox was a fox (again). He went up the mountain to eat blackbirds, to eat (other) things, and came back in the evening. One day he was rather ill. The fox was ill and his brother, as we say his brother (who was as close to him as) a shirt collar, said 'What is the matter with you brother?'

Don't worry, I shall bring her to you also this time. He set off and went up. He went up and he (almost) murdered him. The king (almost) murdered him, he said 'Don't come here. You played tricks on me. You took my daughter for your brother who is a miller, the son of a miller woman'. (31) He said 'Look, I'll tell you, king. How can I curse his mother, since his mother was my mother? She was his mother. How can I curse his father, who was my father. He was his father, how can I curse his father? This just tripped off my tongue[7] and I said "Miller, son of a miller woman". Of course he was not a miller, son of a miller woman'. (32) The king relented (and said to his daughter) 'Go down (to your husband)'. She went down. She went back down to him. After a month, the fox again (became ill), he became really ill. The fox became really ill. He slept behind the stove. Do you know what a stove is? We would put wood in it and it would heat the house. He was ill and lay dead for eight days without anybody daring to approach. He died, he was finished. After eight days he looked and said 'Take him and throw him away'. I have left it there and come here.

(1) There was once[1]—nothing is greater than God—there was a son of an old woman, a man, who had left his village and gone to a town, where he lived. We can see a lamp burning (over there where he dwelt). At that time people used an oil lamp[2] instead of an (electric) lamp. They would put oil in it and it would burn and give off light. (2) At that time the son of the king became ill. A doctor, a physician, came and said 'Your son will not recover unless you bring the yoghurt of lions, on the back of lions, for sick kings. (3) Who can slaughter it, who can approach the lion, kill it and make a churn out of it, a lion churn? Could they slaughter also its cub and make it into a churn, then put it on the back of a lion and bring it to the sick son of the king? There is nobody (who can do this).

(4) He (the king) went to the town, but nobody dared to go up (to do) it. He went to the town and said 'Is there anybody who can fetch yoghurt of lions and a churn of lions on the back of lions for the sick son of the king?' (5) Nobody dared. Who would dare go up (and do that)? They said 'There is a house over there. Let us go and see what that is there'. They went up and pressed him (to do it).[3] He said 'You must go and fetch this thing'. (6) He told him the conditions 'We shall kill your son (if you do not do so)'. He said 'Well, can I bring back a lion? I cannot bring back a lion'. He said 'That is not possible'. 'You must go'. 'Listen, do not kill my son. I shall go and try (to do it). I shall see whether I can find a solution. If I cannot, have my son killed, what can I do?'

(7) He set off and went up a mountain. There was a spring there in that mountain. The lionness, her leg was swollen. Her leg was swollen. She cried to God, (on account of) her leg. There were three cubs with her, three young offspring were with her. Such (young) they call 'cubs'. (8) She went down to drink water and then returned again. She cried out to God. She had nobody to look after her leg. She could not (cope), since it was so swollen, full of sores and filth. (9) As for the man, there was a papyrus brake close by, a very large papyrus brake, in which he hid. He prepared a long stick, which reached from here to that thing over there. He sharpened it well and made it like a needle. He made it like a needle and the lionness came down, yelling. She came down and he heard her.

(10) She stood and her young went down and drank the water. They came back and stood there. She then went down and drank water. When she went down, he struck her leg with the stick. She cried out 'Whatever you are come out! I shall make you attain your heart's desire. I shall do whatever you want'. (11) He did not come out. Again she came down and drank. Also this time he struck her leg. She said 'Ask! Whatever you want, whatever your heart's desire is, I shall do it!' But he did not come out. He burst her leg a little, he burst it a little. (12) Then, three times she bent down to drink water. He struck her leg harder and burst her leg, three times, he burst it completely. She said 'Come out! (I give you) an Arab promise, I shall do for you whatever you want'. He came out, he said 'An Arab promise!', that is there was trust at that time. (13) She said 'What is it?' He said 'A churn of lions, yoghurt of lions and (carriage on) the back of lions for the sick son of a king'. The promise was an Arab one, she had to perform it. She went and took up her young cub behind a hill and slaughtered it. She slaughtered her young cub and made it into a churn. (14) The next day what did she do? She herself set some milk, she milked herself and made it into yoghurt. She put it in the churn, put it on the back of her (other) young cub and said 'Take it down to the king'. (15) He brought the yoghurt down to the son of the king, who was afflicted with leprosy. They applied the yoghurt to him and he recovered. I have left it there and come here.

(1) There was a woman and a daughter. She said (to her daughter) 'Today is Saturday, let's go down to the river. Come, bring down a pan, wood and so forth to make hot water for us to wash'. She went down and brought down a comb, clothes and so forth and set up a pan for her mother so that they could wash. (2) A crow came, took her comb and stole it away. She ran after it, ran and ran. She tried (to persuade it to come back by) calling:

> (3) Crow, my little crow
> Give me back my little comb
> so that my mother does not beat me

(4) It still did not give it back. The crow came to a big palace. It went up onto the roof and threw it into a window. Her comb went down into the house. It went down into the house and she sat and wept and wept and wept. (5) The people who were there in that house were seven brothers. They said 'My brother, it is raining'. He said 'Yes, by God, it is raining'. One of them went outside and came back saying 'No, it is not raining, it is fine'. It was the tears of her eyes. (6) Then they went up to the roof and saw that girl on the roof. They said 'There is a girl here. They took her and brought her down. They said 'Hey, what are you doing here?' She said 'This is my story. A crow stole my comb and put it through your window'. (7) They said 'Come, become a sister for us'. She said 'No, I shall not stay. Take me back. My mother—I am an only daughter and my mother is weeping'. They said 'We do not know where she is, where your mother is. The crow brought you. Become a sister for us'.

(8) She became a sister for them. She always remained there by herself while they went hunting, all alone. The cat was angry and urinated in the fire and extinguished her fire. So she did not have a fire. (9) She went outside and saw a fire far off. She said 'I shall go and see where that fire is. I shall go there to make food for my brothers'. She went a long way and arrived at an oven with a large fire. (10) A giant was asleep there. A very beautiful woman was sitting removing his lice. She took some of the fire and returned. There was a ball of thread in her pocket and it fell. The ball fell from it, from her pocket. It became attached to the door and the ball ran from that giant up to the door of their house.

(11) He picked it up and came (after it). He reached the door of the house in which she had entered and he entered searching for her. Every day she would stretch out her hand and every day he would suck a finger. She became very weak. She did not reveal this (to her brothers). She did not dare. (12) They said 'Sister, what is the matter with you? Why are you weak?' She did not reveal it. They said 'Sister, we shall stoke it'—there was a large oven—'in order for us to make bread. We shall stoke it, we shall set fire to it and then it will go out. (13) We shall put a large mattress there. Every time he (the giant) comes, you put your hand like this in the dough. Say "I am baking". When he comes back say "I am baking. When I finish, I shall give you my finger to suck. Sit and rest awhile here"'. (14) He came in and she put her hands in the dough that she was kneading. He said 'Give me the little finger for me to suck'. She said 'Sit awhile on that mattress'. She hid her brothers. She said 'When I finish, I shall give my finger to you'. (15) He came in. She said 'Sit down'. He came and when he sat down, he went down together with the mattress into the oven. He was very large. He went down into it and her brothers, her seven brothers, attacked his head with spades, killed him and cut him to pieces. (16) She remained alone. 'Where are you from?' She said 'My brothers ran away'. They said 'You are really our sister'. Her brothers took the ash and said 'Sister, sweep up the ash. Take it and scatter it behind seven mountains, in a sack that is clean'. (17) What did she do? She put it in a sack the bottom of which was torn. As she walked, it spilt along the way. As she walked, it spilt along the way. When she returned, it had all grown into (the plant) we call kerabso, a herb that was pleasant to eat. (18) She said 'How pleasant this plant is to eat. I shall take some for my brothers. I shall make it into vegetable stew for them to eat. I shall cook it'. She went down, picked that plant, brought it back and cooked it.

(19) Her brothers came back, her seven brothers, from hunting. They came back and ate. She said 'Today I have made you a delicious vegetable stew'. They ate it. When they had eaten the first spoonful, they all turned into lambs, sheep. They all turned into sheep. (20) They turned into sheep and she took them out every day to pasture them. She wept, wailed, wept and wept. One day a man came, a vagabond. He came there and said 'What is the matter with you girl that you are weeping so much in front of these sheep?' (21) She said 'These used not to be sheep, they used to be my brothers. The story of what happened is this. I made vegetable stew for these brothers of mine and, when they ate it, they turned into sheep'.

(22) He said 'I shall cure these brothers of yours, only will you marry me?' She said 'Only if you cure these brothers of mine, shall I marry you'. He said 'Go beyond that mountain over there. I shall strike each brother of yours with seven lashes of a stick and they will turn (back to humans). Do not say "Your poor sister".[1] If you say "Your poor sister", they will not return'. (23) He beat the first one with seven lashes of a stick. He was bleating. He stood up, he turned into a man. He beat the second one, likewise beat the third, likewise the fourth, likewise the fifth and the sixth. (24) The seventh was the youngest. It was he who saw her on the roof. He bleated and bleated. She said 'Oh, your poor sister!' He became half man and half lamb'. He said 'Why did you say "Your poor sister"?' She said 'My heart yearned for him.[2] He was my young brother, so I said "Your poor sister"'. (25) He married her. They (her brothers) went off and he married her. He took with them the one that had become half lamb and half man.

(26) That man was very rich. He was rich and took a house. One day he said 'I shall take a servant girl for you'. She said 'I do not want a servant girl'. He said 'No, I shall take a servant girl for you, a gypsy'. One day he took her on, he said 'She will come and be with you here'. She said 'No, no'. He said 'Yes, so that you will not work. She will work'. (27) One day they went down to bathe. They went down to bathe, there was a deep well by them. They went down to bathe. What did she do? The gypsy girl put her in that well. She put on the clothes of that girl and went up (to the house). (28) She went up, while the lamb bleated and bleated, incessantly. She said 'What is the matter with you? Why are you bleating?' He said 'What is the matter with you?' She did not reveal her face so that he saw her. She kept her face covered. She constantly wept 'My heart burns for this brother of mine and I weep'[3]—it was all lies. (29) One day he said 'I'd like to see what this lamb is doing. Every day he went the same way[4] and would go down to that place. He would look into the well and weep. 'What should I do? I cannot go up and find you and hold you. I have no hands. He brough his grist into the water-mill and it started to be ground. Then, he looked and saw that a bear had come. It had come and sat in front of the door of the mill. (2) He looked and said 'By God, that bear has come and sat down. How can I get out?!' He stayed in the mill. After a while, a fox came. 'Greetings to you, sister bear!'. She said 'Welcome brother fox! How are you?' He said 'Thank you, I am well, sister bear. How are you?' She said 'I am well, thank you'. (3) 'What are you doing?' 'By God, I am sitting here to rest a little'. He said 'I also shall sit here with you'. They sat. Not long passed before a dog came. He also (said) 'Greetings to you!' 'You are most welcome!' He also sat down. (4) A little more (time) went by and a cat came. She also (said) 'Greetings to you!' 'You are most welcome!' She also sat down. They sat a little longer, then a mouse came on the back of a horse, riding, dressed in fine clothes, riding on the back of his horse, passing by. (5) He stopped his horse and looked 'Greetings to you all!' They said 'You are most welcome. Where (are you going) brother mouse?' He said 'By God, I am going to a wedding'. They said 'Where (are you going) while so festively dressed, with your sword and with tastles on your clothes?' (6) He said 'I am going to a wedding. But, while you are sitting, I shall sit with you and have fun. I'll reach the wedding (before it finishes)'. He also sat down there. (7) Now, they sat in this way for a while and then the bear said 'Is anyone of you for a song or something to entertain us while we sit here?' The cat said 'Yes, by God, sister bear, I know how to sing'. The cat sang and sang. They got up and danced. The mouse drew his sword, while in the middle of the gathering. They danced and it seemed as if there was a wedding there. (8) They rested a little. They said 'Let's rest a little'. The bear asked the cat, she said 'Sister cat, where did you learn those songs of yours, which are so beautiful?' She said 'Sister bear, I was an interpreter in Wolto for seven years'. She (the bear) said 'Sister cat, your songs are beautiful, sing to us some more'. (9) The cat sang again and they got up and danced. They finished and they said 'Where did you learn these songs from? They are more beautiful than the others'. I learnt them in Halmun. I went on business there. I heard the girls singing and I learnt them from them'.

(10) While they were sitting, they saw that the fox was dressed up, that his clothes were very fine. They said 'From where (did you get) these clothes of yours that are so fine, brother fox? Your clothes are something special compared with ours'. He said 'Sister bear, that is a (long) story'. They said 'What is the story? Tell us!' (11) He said 'No. It cannot be told, lest people hear us'. They said 'There is nobody here'. They looked. They saw nobody. 'We are alone. We are brothers'. (12) He said 'Once I came across a bag that was full like this of gold. I went and dug (a hole) under a tree and hid it there. Every so often I take from it for myself a gold coin. I sleep under that tree, on top of my gold, so that somebody does not come and take it'.

(13) Nanno was listening. He said 'Fox, I shall show you. I curse your father! I shall take that gold from you'. Nanno waited until they had all gone, each had gone away.[1] Then he followed after the fox. He followed after the fox and went a long way, then saw the fox sleeping under a tree. (14) He came and took a walking stick, a piece of wood. He struck the fox. The fox ran away. He came and dug. He took out the gold of the fox and took it home. He went (home). He took all of his gold. He became a millionaire. (15) He bought a house, he bought things. He became something special in the village, richer than everybody else. Jəndo, his friend, came. He asked Nanno 'Brother, where is this wealth from?' He said 'It is a long story'. (16) He pressed him,[2] since he wanted to know where it was from. He said 'By God, the story is like this. I went on my way and some animals came and sat down. They sang and then the fox said "I have some gold" and revealed where he had hidden it. I followed him and took it'. He said 'Where were you sitting?' He said 'In the water-mill'.

(17) The next day Jəndo went to the water-mill. He said 'They will come again and sit there'. He said 'They will come again to the water-mill'. He went to the water-mill and hid himself. They came. The bear came, the dog came, the cat came, the mouse came, for they had made a plan 'Also tomorrow we shall get together'. (18) Then the fox came, limping, his leg broken, his back crushed. He came, limping and when he arrived there, they said 'What is the matter with you brother fox? What has happened to you? All your clothes are torn. Where are those (fine) clothes of yours? What has happened to you? You were so well-decked out yesterday. What has happened to you today?'

I tried, my sister bear, not to tell the story of where the gold coins were from, but you said "You must tell it". Somebody must have been listening to us'. (20) 'Where can he be listening?' He looked and said 'I think he was in this mill. He had hidden himself in the mill'. Perhaps he has gone there also today'. They went into the mill to search. Jɔndo then looked and saw that they all had entered. He heard their voices. He went and hid himself. (21) They searched and searched and searched. Then one of them came across his foot. (1) There was a king, who was very unjust. He was not married. He wanted to marry. He would said 'The woman whom I shall marry[1] must tell me a story that has no end'. Every woman that came, her story finished after one or two days. (2) One woman said to her father 'I shall go and tell a story to the king. Let him kill me (if he wishes). Perhaps I shall win'. She went (to the king and he said) 'I feel pity for you',[2] he said 'Can you tell a story that does not end?' She said 'Yes, I can'. He said 'So tell me!' (3) She said 'There was a king who was very unjust like you. He had a very large province. He gathered the wheat from all of that region and put it in a silo'. She said 'He put all of it in it and covered all of its walls with cement, so that there was not even a door in it. (4) He left a small hole like this, through which only an ant could go in and come out'. She said 'The ants began to go into that wheat and come out. Now, the wheat was hundreds of tons'. (5) She said 'The first ant went in and took one grain, then went out. The second went in and took a grain and went out. The third went in (and took) a grain and went out'. She said 'Until the wheat finished, the ants were going in one by one. There was no other place (to enter). They went in only one by one'. He said 'You are right, that will never end'.

(1) There was a girl called Nasimo. Mass was performed in church, so that she had to go to take communion. She did not go out for days, since she was so beautiful, her hair flowing down to here. She had seven brothers. They said 'Our sister will not go out of the house. We shall take her'. (2) They went off. They did not come back early, they were delayed. She said 'Well, I shall go to church. These brothers (of mine) have not come back'. She went to church to take communion and the plain filled with Arab horsemen. The plain filled with Arabs. They came and kidnapped her and took her away.[1] (3) Her eldest brother came back and did not find his sister. She (was always) sitting like a lady at home. He did not see her. He said:

(10) He bade them farewell 'Remain in peace! I am going. Perhaps it is the road of no return'. He went a long way and arrived at a village. He said 'Is this the village of such-and-such a person?' He said 'Yes'. He said 'Where is his residence, his house?' He said 'That is his residence over there'. (11) He went up there and stood outside the house. He had an embroidered handkerchief, which was woven by his father on the wood (of the loom) and embroidered by his sister. He held it in his hand, weeping, shedding tears and wiping his eyes. He sat there and started to sing dirges:

(1) There was a boy, who went down to the army. His wife was a daughter of poor people. That woman (the mother of the boy) had seven daughters-in-law, seven water-mills, and sheep, everything in sevens. But all of these—the women were not becomng pregnant, the goats were not producing young, the mills were not (producing). They all stopped (producing). (2) She went to a person and consulted her fortune. She said 'Is that which the fortune (foretells) true?' They said 'It is so'. They said 'Kill one daughter-in-law, stop one mill, kill in addition one goat, and all your affairs will be put right'. She said 'Is it so?' They said 'Yes'.[1] (3) She went (home) and said 'Whom should I kill, my father God?' Now, whereas all the others were daughters of gentlemen, this Šoše was the daughter of poor people. She went and killed her, Šošət Xere, and buried her in the horses' manger below (in the basement stable). (4) She buried her in the horses' manger and her son came back. He found everybody at home. He said 'Greetings to you'. They said 'Welcome'. He said 'Where is Šošət Xere, mother?' She said 'My dear, she has gone to the oven'. (5) He went to the oven and said 'Oven, oven, where is Šošət Xere?' It said 'She has not gone before me[2] recently'. He came back and said 'Mother! The oven replied to me (with only) bread, why? Where is Šošət Xere?' 'My dear, she has gone to the water'. (6) He went and said 'Spring, spring, where is Šošət Xere?' It said 'She has not gone before me'. She (the mother) still does not reveal (the truth). He was walking in an alley. His wedding friend—when he married she was his wedding friend—was singing a dirge over a cradle.

    (7) Halalaye, my dear, halalaye
    Crying is not for you
    Crying is for Šošət Xere
    Who has been killed and buried in the horses' manger

He heard her voice and said:

    (8) My friend raise your voice
    You burnt my liver and lungs
    When you mentioned Šošət Xere
    When you mentioned Šošət Xere

(10) That is she is buried in a small place and you cannot see her. He again went off. He wept. He came back to the house and said 'Mother, I have heard such-and-such'. 'Oh my dear, you do not know what she is saying'. Again he went to that alley. Once again she was telling the same thing. She said:

(13) Now, all these (words) weighed on his heart. He went down and said 'Mother, give me a pick-axe, give it to me, how much more can I wait?' 'Why, my dear?' He said 'I have heard many things. You are not revealing (the truth) to me. I know'. (14) He went down and searched in the horses' manger. The manger had been dug, manure or the like had been put on top of it. She was buried there, she came out glowing like a night candle. He said 'My dear, my girl, it is true'. (15) What did he do? He also killed himself and threw himself there. Two poplar trees grew up. Heaven says that any hidden thing will be uncovered. They tried to cut them down, but they kept growing up, until they grew like this. (16) She knew that what was hidden would be uncovered. His mother began to bury herself (in remorse). His mother began to kill herself (with remorse). She said 'It will no longer be of any use to you to kill yourself. You son is dead. Your daughter-in-law is dead. Your house has been ruined'.

(1) There was a woman and a man. The woman said to her husband 'Go, man! Go and work! Go and work! Why are you sitting idly in the house? It is not right!'[1] He said 'No, there is no work'. She said 'Go! Perhaps you will find work'. (2) He set off and went to the mountains. He travelled a long way. It became dark. He said 'My God, my Lord, where shall I go? It has become dark. I do not know anybody. There is no house and there is no person here'. He saw a fire burning in a cave. (3) He said 'I shall go and make for that cave. I shall go towards it. I shall go and knock on the door of the cave, whether there are people there or there are no people there'. He went and knocked on the door of the cave. (4) He saw seven giants sitting there. Seven giants were sitting in that cave. He said 'My God, it is very dark, either wolves are sure to eat me or I shall go to these giants and the giants are sure to eat me'. He knocked on their door and went in to meet them. (5) When he went in to meet them, he looked and noticed that the head of each of them reached the (top of) the mountain, his beard fell down to here and his moustache to here. He said 'They are sure to eat me, I know. But I shall say something'—he thought this to himself. (6) He said 'Greetings to you my brothers'. They looked at each other. They said 'Have we another brother?' They said 'How do you know that we are brothers?' He said 'My mother sent me to you. She said "Go to your brothers. They are in such-and-such a place"'. He made this up himself to save his life. (7) He said 'My God, what shall I do? I have to say such things'. They said 'Well, if you are our brother, come and sit here with us. Eat, eat with us'. He ate and served (himself food) like them. (8) He ate and they said 'By God, you are really our brother. Let us say to you something else. (There are) three things (you need to do in order to prove that you are our brother). We have eliminated this one. Two other things remain. (9) We say to you that we have a water-skin that is very large. We shall go up and fetch water from that mountain over there. That mountain is very far away. It is very far away. Can you take it there?'

A40   THE WISE DAUGHTER OF THE KING

Informant: Xošebo ʾOdišo (ʾƐn-Nune)

(1) There was a king. People would come to amuse him. There was a father and daughter who had a dispute. They fought, my dear, my dear brother, they fought together. He (the king) said 'The man is in charge of the house'. She said 'No father! The girl is in charge of the house'. (2) He said 'Why do you say that?' She said 'My father, it is so. They say 'A man is sick, but a woman looks after the home.[1] A woman who is clever brings (benefit) to the home'. (3) He said 'My dear, you are very clever, but against your will, I am going to give you to a paralysed man (living) in an oven (house)'.[2] 'Never mind. Give me (to him)'. (4) Her father gave her to a paralysed man (living) in an oven (house), one day he would eat, but another day he would not eat, so poor was he. He said 'I shall give you to him'. 'Do you know more than me?'[3] He said 'It is so. Do you still insist (on what you said)?' She said 'I do not insist, father, but this word of mine is true'. (5) He gave her to a paralysed man. What did she do to that paralysed man? She took him , bathed him and washed his clothes. She put money in his hand and would say 'Go to the market!' He would say 'I don't know (how to)' and she would say 'You will learn'. (6) Every day she beat him seven blows of a stick. She would say 'You must go to the market. I shall give you money. You should bathe and wash your clothes first. Go to the market and buy (things), then bring them home. You will learn. She treated him like that. (7) That man quickly became the foremost man in the town.[4] He went to another village. He (the king) had married them in another village, not in their own village. Then his daughter built villas and palaces. (8) The door of her house was all of dressed marble. Their plates and trays on which they ate food were gold, (their) spoon was gold. Anybody who ate with them (was treated) the same. She went and brought horsemen. We say swariye in Barwar, people who sat on the back of mules.

[1] The root xpy, from which the form xapɛθa is derived, literally means 'to cover, protect, brood (hen)'.

[2] Poor people used to live inside a house that was constructed over the village oven to keep warm and beg for scraps fo bread.

[3] I.e. Are you sure you know what you are doing?

(9) They all went to the king. They brought a letter from the hand of his daughter. They went and (conveyed the message that) she had invited him. They said 'King, may you be healthy, your daughter has invited you to come to us. We shall show you the house. You will come with us'. (10) He said 'I gave this daughter of mine to a paralysed man. She has invited me to an oven (house)'. They said 'King, may you be healthy, she has said so, you must come'. He set off and went on his way. He also had an army and relatives with him. He travelled for a long way. (11) He said 'Where is her house?' He thought it was a hut. They said 'That villa that you can see over there'. He said 'I don't believe it'. They said 'Why? When you go inside it, you will see that your daughter and her husband are there'. He still said 'I don't believe it'. (12) They travelled for an hour and then arrived. They went up and came to steps, all made of dressed stone, all with marble on this side and that side. They entered the house. His daughter came out to meet him and said 'Welcome dear, esteemed father, honoured in this world. Welcome. You are invited by your daughter'. (13) He said 'Is this house yours, my daughter?' She said 'Yes'. He was amazed. She said 'No, father, do not be amazed. That is life.[5] It goes up and down. From being king people descend to the dung heap and from the dung heap people rise to be kings. Anything can happen'. (14) He was amazed by those fine words of hers. 'Welcome, father'. He did not know in which chair to sit, in which chair of gold. She arranged everything like this, a room for those men, a room for those other men, for those gentlemen (of the court). She put up everybody separately.[6] (15) Her servants brought in the service, (which consisted) entirely of gold vessels and trays. She began to serve food. He said 'Daughter, queen, you will stand in my place, you are greatly blessed. My kingdom will be for you'. (16) He said 'My kingdom will be for you, since you have been clever, with the honour of sweet and fine words. You have worked hard. I tested you to see how you clever you are. It was not that I did not love you. I have seen that you are very clever, twice as much as me. You will sit as queen in place of your father, greatly honoured'. She became queen in place of her father.

(2) She said to her husband 'Take your father and throw him into the Valley of Almonds. We have had enough of him. He has lived for a hundred years. We have had enough of him. Either take him and throw him down or I shall go away from the house'. (3) The young man said 'Fine, wife'. He came and called his father. He said 'Come father. Come onto my back'. (4) He carried him on his back and went out. He went through the threshing floors of Dure and passed further on. His father laughed from the back of his son. (5) He laughed and he (the son) said 'Hey, father, why are you laughing?' His father said why he was laughing. (6) He said 'I have not done a good service to my father. If I had done a good service to my father, you also would do a good service to me'. Then he said 'You yourself will be measured with the same measure, you will be measured by it'. (7) The son stopped. He thought. He looked one side and the other. He returned and brought his father back. He went and took him back, and put him in the house. (8) He called his wife and said 'Wife, here is a door, here is a second, here is a window. Go out of any of them you wish to go out from. I shall not take my father away from here.

A46   The Lion King

Informant: Gwərgəs Dawið (ʾƐn-Nune)

(1) There was a lion, he was the ruler of a region. He had made an agreement with the animals that every day they should bring an animal to him so that he could eat it and be satisfied and so not touch other animals. The turn of the rabbit came. She did not go up to him. (2) The animals tried (to persuade her saying) 'Go up! He will come now and get angry. He will come and eat us all'. She said 'I shall not go up. It is not your business'. After a some time passed, he started to get angry and shouted 'She has not come!' (3) She went up slowly putting her hand behind her back. She arrived there and he made towards her in order to eat her. She said 'Stop! Do not eat me!' He said' Why did you not come?' She said 'Are you the only lion? There is another lion, bigger than you, stronger. He did not allow me to come'. (4) 'Where is he? Show him to me!' She took him, saying 'Come with me'. They went to the head of a well. It was a water well. She said 'There he is'. He looked and saw his image there. He threw himself in to do battle with it. She (the rabbit) drowned him and all the animals were content.

(1) Once a woman, a girl was walking in the gardens and saw a tiger incarcerated in a cage. She felt sorry for him and opened the door. He came out and made (towards her) to eat her. She said to him 'Why are you going to eat me? I did good to you. Why will you eat me?' (2) He said 'Man is treacherous'. He said 'Whenever a man does a service, always in the end he strikes the man performing the service'.[1] He said 'Ask (others)!' (3) A horse came. He said to him 'He will arbitrate between me and you'. She asked him saying 'Is it true that man is treacherous? Whenever one does good to him, he acts treacherously?' He said 'Yes, he acts treacherously'. (4) She said 'How can that be?' He said 'I am a horse. All my life he (my master) has been putting loads on my back. When I die, he will strip off my skin and make it into shoes to wear on his feet'. (5) Every one that came said something. She saw a fox. She waved her hand like this. 'I shall give you a chicken as a bribe'. She said 'What is your judgement?' She said 'He was in a cage. I released him. Now he says "Man is treacherous, I must eat him"' (6) He said 'I do not understand. Come let's go and see where it was'. They went and took him to the cage'. He said to him 'Where were you?' 'I was in this cage'. He said 'Go in so that we can see how you got in and fitted in it'. (7) He went in and he closed the door. He said (to the girl) 'Go!' He saved her. She went to bring a chicken for him. She went and said to her father 'The situation is like this, I have done such-and-such. I have given a promise to a fox who has saved me from a tiger. How can I give it to him, the chicken to the fox?' (8) He said 'Come, I'll take it for you'. They gave a chicken to her, she gave it to her father and he went off. He brought a stick with him. The fox came. The fox was happy. He said 'Now he will give me the chicken'. He said 'Throw it'. (9) He said 'No. I shall not throw it. I must put it in your mouth. Come, I do not believe the kindness you have done to me'. He came close to him, put the chicken in his mouth and struck the stick on his head. So, man is indeed treacherous.

(1) There was a man in a village who was a great liar. He would tell lies about people, saying so-and-so did such-and-such, so-and-so did such-and-such. He would do all kinds of (deceptive) things to them and people did not believe him, people did not believe him. His house was quite far from the village. (2) One fine day[1] he said 'Let me test the people of the village. Let's see whether they will help me or not'. In front of his house there were some pieces of wood, and such like. He set fire to them. He cried 'Woe! Woe! My house has burnt down'. (3) They knew that he was a liar. They saw that fire had been kindled in his house, but not that his house had burnt down, only a few sticks far from his house. The people of the village went (to help), but before the people of the village arrived, the fire was put out. (4) Two or three months, four months passed. He said 'I'll test them again'. He tested them again. He lit a fire in the same way. He cried 'Oh my house has burnt down!'. They went (to help) once again, but by the time they had gone, it was put out. (5) What did he do the third time? He continued to tell lies in the village 'He did such-and-such. He said such-and-such', slandering this one and that one, yes, telling lies. One day his house really burnt down. His house burnt down and he tried crying (for help) 'Oh, my house has burnt down!' (6) They said 'Go away, liar! Go way, liar! You have been a great liar for the last two times. You have tested us to see whether we would come to help you or not. We shall not come to help you any more. Let your house burn, let it burn. It is not our business'. (7) The house caught fire and all his house burnt down. Afterwards they look and see that his all house had burnt down. They said 'Oh, by God, the house of the liar has burnt down, without us knowing about it'.

SECTION A: STORIES
THE QAṬINA LEGEND

A50   THE SISISAMBƏR PLANT

Informant: Awiko Sulaqa (ʾƐn-Nune)

(1) They reproached Qaṭina, saying 'You must bring the sisisambər plant. Grandfather[1] Toma has become blind'. 'Where is the sisisambər?' 'With Leliθa. Nobody can reach it. The sisisambər is with Leliθa'.

> (2) Qaṭina, oh Qaṭina
> He is sitting drinking wine
> Drinking and getting drunk
> Talking disparagingly about somebody or another

> (3) 'Who is the man amongst men
> Who could jump the jump I have jumped,
> And could drink the glass I have drunk?'

(4) Some people came and said 'Grandfather Toma has become blind and you sit and drink'—this was to Qaṭina. 'Sisisambər is with Leliθa. They bring it to the eyes of a blind man, so that they will open, so that the dead will live. Whoever is dead, lives'. (5) Now, Xulləkko said 'I shall go down and fetch it'. Xulləkko was the son of the aunt of Qaṭina. He said 'I shall go down and fetch it'. (6) He reproached him. Xulləkko set off and went down, but Qaṭina did not go down. He went down and she (Leliθa) saw Xulləkko. He said 'I want the sisisambər'—(speaking) to Leliθa—'I shall take it up to grandfather Toma'. (7) She seized him like this. She tied his legs with one hair from her behind and threw him down there. She put a mill-stone (capable of being lifted only by) seventy-seven heroic men onto his chest. (8) Two days, three days (passed), but Xulləkko did not come back. Then Qaṭina said:

> (9) Oh mother, bake me supplies
> Oh sister, prepare me cakes
> A way has come to my mind
> I have been shamed by Toman my uncle

(10) Qaṭina leapt two bounds and arrived at Leliθa. He said 'Where is Xulləkko?' She said 'There he is'. On the chest of Xulləkko there had been placed a mill-stone (that could be lifted only by) seventy heroic men, it had been placed on his chest. Qaṭina gave a kick, he kicked that mill-stone. It came off and struck a mountain. He turned it into black water, which came out in its place. (11) She said 'Why have you come Qaṭina?' He said 'I have come seeking the sisisambər'. She took a club and threw it at Qaṭina. Qaṭina jumped up under the lightning of the sky. Half of his forelock was singed by the sun. That club of hers hit a hill and made it into water, into a sea. (12) Then, in half an hour he came down, thump, before the entrance of the cave. He sank into the mud up to here. She said 'Hey, I had made you (like) tobacco snuff!' He said 'May your house be destroyed, destroyed over your head Leliθa!' (13) She said 'It is your turn'. Since she said 'Qaṭina, it is your turn', he drew his sword, swoosh. He struck it on the head of Leliθa and cut her into two pieces'. (14) She said '(Hit) me again with another (blow)'. He said 'No, we, the family of grandfather Toma, do not strike two blows'. If he were to hit her with another (blow), she would heal and eat him. She said

> (15) Oh your mother spins crowns
> Oh your sister twists twisted threads
> Qaṭina is a groom without being wed

(16) Qaṭina was not married. She cursed him. He said 'Get up. Dance for me a bear dance'. She got up and danced, one part (of her) fell this side and one that side. He went up and took the sisisambər. He brought it to grandfather Toma. They put it on his eyes and they opened.

I am reproached by Tumin my uncle

(6) Now Qaṭina went off looking for Xuldəkko his nephew, who had gone away and had been captured. He had been captured, when he went away. When he reached the orchard, when Qaṭina reached the orchard, he hid, since he had said (to himself) ‘You should hide from Leliθa so that she does not eat you’. (7) She was in a cave. When he went under a vine, all the vegetation, all the apples, grapes and vines started screaming and shouting:

(8) Woe to us, a catastrophe (has come) upon us
We are cut down and harvested
Not in the season nor in our time (for cutting)

(9) Leliθa got up and came out of her cave. When she had come out of her cave, she ran around the orchard, but did not see anything. What was his purpose? He wanted to reach the entrance to the cave to kill Leliθa. (10) She took a turn around, then went into her cave, very angry. He went off again and reached (a place) under another vine, getting nearer. The vegetation began again:

(12) Leliθa came out again, very angry

She took a short turn around
Very angry she went back into the front of the cave
She saw nothing

(13) Again, he slowly went along, stealthily, and arrived at the entrance of the cave. The vegetation again started shouting:

(14) Woe to us, a catastrophe (has come) upon us
We are cut down and harvested
Not in the season nor in our time (for cutting)

(15) Leliθa got up, beating herself in anger, shrieking and screaming (as she walked) around:

(16) Leliθa went out from her small cave.
She made a small turn around
But did not see anything
And slowly went back into her cave

(17) Qaṭina had gone in there before her. When he went in there before her, he took a book that belonged to her. He took her book and put it in his pocket. When she came, he lunged his sword into her. (18) They began to fight. When he lunged his sword into her, he cut her into two pieces, one piece on this side and one on the other. She said 'Strike me another blow with the sword'. (19) He said 'I shall not strike you. You are the family of Nasimo. I have heard you are good dancers. Take this handkerchief in your hand and dance!' He put the handkerchief into her hand. She began to dance, like this, on that side, then xrrr she fell to the ground. He killed her. (20) Then he went to the entrance of the cave. (He went to) the mouth of what we call a pot, the pot where Xuldəkko had been placed. It had a flat stone that was placed on top of Xuldəkko, fifty men could not pick it up, since it was so big. That is, I myself, if I were there (and tried) to lift it, I could not have lifted it. (21) He went and look what a miracle (he performed),[3] and so forth. Qaṭina opened the mouth (of the jar) for his nephew, took away the stone and took Xuldəkko out of the jar.

(1) Once Yuwanəs the Armenian came and plundered, (he came) to plunder the family of grandfather Toma. He plundered their sheep, their buffaloes, their camels. He plundered them all. He kidnapped the sister of grandfather Toma and went down (to his land). (2) Qaṭina was young. He (Yuwanəs) kicked the cradle of Qaṭina and span it round seventy times. When it span round seventy times, grandfather Toma made seventy donations until the cradle stopped. He was young. (This was) what people said,[1] the lies of that time. (3) When he grew up, Qaṭina grew up and became a man, they said 'Your aunt—Yuwanəs the Armenian plundered your sheep, plundered the women, plundered them all, plundered your aunt and took her down (with him as) he went down (to his land)'. He said 'Where does he live? Where is he?' 'He lives in the desert at such-and-such (a distance)'. 'By my life, how far it is! Then he said to them:

> (4) Oh sister, prepare me supplies
> Oh sister, bake me cakes
> A way has come to my mind
> I have been shamed by Toman my uncle

(5) Qaṭina got up. His moustache was one metre long. He went down to the desert. A rabbit said 'I shall become your friend'. He said 'Poor girl,[2] how will you become my friend?! You go into that bush over there. (6) When he leapt one leap, each leap, from here, was ten miles, he put his leg down ten miles (further on). He arrived in front of the door of his aunt. Yuwanəs was not there. (7) Yuwanəs had gone out into the desert (to conduct) a manoeuvre of his armies, a manoeuvre with forty thousand soldiers on one side, forty thousand soldiers on another side, forty thousand soldiers on another side and forty thousand soldiers on another side. That is Yuwanəs the Armenian had an army of a hundred and sixty thousand soldiers at that time. (8) He (Qaṭina) said 'Where is Yuwanəs?' He went up to the roof. All the iron bars of the roof bent. His aunt came out and said 'Such a force is the force of my father's family. Such a thing as this, going onto the roof and bending these (bars) is unheard of'.[3]

He said 'Aunt, I have come to take you up (to your home)'. (10) She said 'My son, you cannot take me up. Yuwanəs the Armenian has a hundred and sixty thousand soldiers with him. He is in the desert'. He said 'I shall take you up, aunt. I shall go down to fight Yuwanəs the Armenian'. (11) What did she do? He slept. Qaṭina slept for eight days. He slept. What did she do? She went and took his sword to a craftsman—they call him a jaqsi—and he riveted it. (He was one) of those people who did riveting. He riveted all his sword so that he could not draw it. (12) She took it to the craftsman and tampered with his sword, while he did not know. He did not know and she gave his sword back to him. He got up in the morning. He slept for eight days. He finished (sleeping) and woke up. He got up and went down. (13) He went down and let out a shout in the desert. All the mares miscarried and cast out their young. They brought forth their young. All the soldiers died on account of the shout. Only Yuwanəs the Armenian was left. All of them died. The mares, his army, they all died on account of the shout, when he let out a mightly shout. (14) He said 'Yuwanəs', he said 'I have come to fight you. You have done such-and-such, you have plundered our town. You have carried off women, you have carried off my aunt, (as well as) all (the others). I have come to fight you'. (15) He made an agreement that they would strike each other (in a contest). Yuwanəs the Armenian also had a club, like that of Leliθa. If he struck with his club, he would make all of that town turn to water, white and black water would come out in its place. (16) He said 'Who should strike first?' He said 'We, the family of Toma, do not strike first. We, the family of Toma, do not strike the first blow. You strike'. He said 'OK, it's an agreement'. (17) He dealt a blow against Qaṭina. Qaṭina leapt. He leapt under the lightning of the sky. After half an hour he came down. He said 'Hey, didn't I make you (like) tobacco snuff? Have you come down again?' '(Why) should I have been finished off by your stupid club?![4] I must go and pray, I am a deacon. I must go and pray'. (18) Qaṭina said this. Qaṭina then wanted to strike. He tried (to pull out his sword) krrr, he tried, it was riveted. He struck it (the sword) together with the sheath. He (Yuwanəs) said 'Is that your blow, Qaṭina?' He said 'That is it'.

> Pull me out once.
> Its middle is defiled by blood.
> At its top there is lightning, lightning.

(23) He drew it, it was all riveted. He smashed all (the rivets). He stayed there, waiting for eight days until Yuwanəs the Armenian came back. Yuwanəs the Armenian came back. Now, Yuwanəs the Armenian had said to Qaṭina 'I shall stay for eight days to take pleasure in my wife and children, to take pleasure in my village and to see my relatives, then I shall come back'. He was there for eight days. (24) He came back down. He said 'Now whose turn is it?' Yuwanəs the Armenian said 'It is your turn, you strike'. He took his sword and struck him. He cut him into two pieces. He (Yuwanəs) tried (to persuade Qaṭina by saying) 'Strike me again'. He said 'We the family of Toma do not strike more than one (blow)'. (25) If he had struck again—he was the brother of Leliθa—he would heal and eat him'. He said 'Get up. Dance me a bear dance. Get up and dance'. He got up to dance and one piece fell here and one there. He (Qaṭina) went up and took with him his aunt, took the town, took it all. Then Toma said:

B1   The Village of Dure (1)

Informant: Yuwəl Yuḥanna (Dure)

(1) I am from Barwar. I lived in Dure. Dure is my village. Dure is one of thirty-five villages of Barwar. These thirty-five villages are only Christian villages, Assyrian Christian. There are approximately eighty other Kurdish villages, perhaps more. (2) Once the villages of the Christians were more numerous than those of the Kurds. But as times changed, the Christians began to diminish (in number) and Islam began to increase. (The inhabitants of) many of these villages were slaughtered. Some fled and were (subsequently) killed. They were then changed into Muslim Kurdish villages. (3) Now, those villages that remain until now, about thirty-five villages,—one of them is Dure. We have six villages that are near to one another: ʾƐn-Nune, ʾIyyət, Bəšmiyaye, Dɛrəške and Maye. These are the villages in the land of Barwar. We call it 'our land', its name is the land of Barwar. (4) Its borders are on the East the Zab and on the West the Khabur. They say from the Zab to the Khabur is Barwar. Its borders (in the North) are the Šaranuš mountains, 'those of the peaks', as we call them, which divide lower Ṭyare from Barwar. In the South it is the summit of Amedia. One side of it is Barwar and the other side is Ṣapna. These are its borders.

(5) Barwar is a land which is fertile and historical. It has ancient churches. In Dure alone there are four churches. Two of them were destroyed and obliterated. We do not know their history. But the other two remained until the time that we were there, until the year 1978, when Dure was evacuated. (6) (The church) of Saint Qayyoma was in the village and Saint George was in Dure. In these two churches we used to hold church services. The history of Saint George shows that it was built five hundred or four hundred years or so after Christ. Saint George was built in the fifth century.

(7) It is one thousand five hundred or one thousand six hundred years old. The age of Saint Qayyoma is the same. But there is no written history, only what we have heard and traditions of the people. In Saint George of Dure there was only a stone, on which its history was written, a very ancient stone. This shows that it was built about one thousand four hundred years ago. That is five-hundred or six-hundred years after Christ. (8) Services were held in these very two churches until the year 1978. In that year Dure was evacuated. All the villages of Barwar, or most of the villages, were evacuated and destroyed. The churches were destroyed, the orchards were burnt, the village was left a ruin and the people were driven away, each going a different direction. (9) At that time they evaculated all those villages. Only 'Ɛn-Nune and Dɛríške remained since 'Ɛn-Nune was the capital of the district, they left it. In the year 1988 they evacuated also them, on the 30th January. They said 'You must prepare yourself in three days to be deported.' They came and deported all the people of the village and burnt the village, 'Ɛn-Nune and also Dɛrəške.

(10) That is all of Barwar, from the Zab to the Khabur became (a land) without villages. All were destroyed, both the Kurdish and the Christian villages. On the day that specifically Dure, our village, was evacuated, I was there, I was in the village of Dure. Early in the morning, on the 6th of Tamuz (July), 1978, I was standing at the door of the house. (11) At eight o'clock in the morning I saw some people coming from 'Ɛn-Nune to Dure. They came and entered (the village) and arrived at my home. This was a committee coming from 'Ɛn-Nune, it was the committee for the evacuation of the people, evacuation. They asked me saying 'Where is the house of the village head?' I said 'The village head is in the church'. That day he was at mass. (12) There was a girl of ours who had died. They were holding a mass for her. That was the last girl who was buried in Dure before they evacuated us. I said 'I think he is in the church.' I went and asked them in the courtyard of the church and they went in and called for the village head. The village head came out. (13) After he came out to them, they said 'We are the evacuation committee and we have come to let you know that in four hours from now all the people of the village must leave the village. You should go outside. After four hours we shall burn Dure.' It was a terrifying piece of news. (14) I have myself a poem that I composed. It is very beautiful, but is sad. That is, (it is about) the evacuation of the village. If you had told me, I would have come to recite these poems. It goes:

(15) One Thursday in hot July
In Dure lightning and an earthquake struck
It was surrounded on every boundary
By the army of the tyrannical government

I am continuing with the poems, sixty-five poems.

(16) Then, after the village head gives the news to all the village, the people took out everything they could and went outside the village. The committee goes up the valley and from there they write, they begin to register the houses of the people and what they possess. (17) They then came to the village. They came to the village and went to what was the house of the bishop. The priest Sargun was there. These people and the priest Sargun entered into an argument. They argued. They and the priest almost a fight. They were angry with the priest and went out. (18) They went to the house of the village head. The committee sat in the house of the village head and elected three other people to be members of the committee in order to give evidence regarding the possessions of the people[1] and to register them. They sat down and registered all the apple trees, and their possessions, with the testimony of the village head and the two youngsters, that is Zayya, the deacon Zayya, and Yuḥanna, the one (known as) the teacher Kenno.[2] These were from Dɛrəgne. (19) After four hours had gone by, they had registered the whole village and all their possessions. But it was not as those people wrote. I should have got a good sum of money, but it was I who received almost the least. They deleted everything that I had written. They left (in the register) only apple trees and only wild plum trees. They deleted all the other things. (20) They treated unjustly all the people of the village in the same way. As for houses, we had our villa built in the year fifty-three and fifty-four. We were building the villa for two years, in those days when a workman cost a hundred or a hundred and fifty fils. It cost us seven thousand dinars or six thousand. (21) At the time when they evacuated us, you could not build that house for less than one hundred and fifty thousand dinars. They valued it all as three thousand dinars. I said to the head of the committee, I said 'Can you buy a shop in Baghdad with three thousand dinars? Could you pay even its deposit?'

[1] Literally: what the people had and what they did not have.
[2] Kenno is a hypocoristic form of Yuḥanna.

(22) He said 'That's it (no more negotiations). If you want it, fine. If you do not want it, there is Saddam, go and complain (to him)'. That is what he said. In brief, they registered the property[3] and the people left and all sat outside of the village. Cars came, all of the military type, but they remained there in the fields. (23) They left them for three days there, without food, without drink and without water. On the third day they got into the cars and they took them to Batufe.[4] They stayed in Batufe. Now they are scattered. They left Batufe and every one went off empty handed.

Informant: Dawið 'Adam (Dure)

(1) The village of Dure in Barwari Bala from ancient times had four churches, (those of) Saint Qayyoma, Saint George, Saint Apius and Saint Mary. These were in Dure. (2) Dure was evacuated and destroyed seven times by pagan murderers of Muslims. In the year (19)80, Ṣaddām Ḥusēn came up and destroyed even the churches. (3) We had the church of Saint George, which had what was similar to two floors of a house, that is it was in all fifty, eighty metres, even a hundred metres in height. (The area) on top of it was designed for war. People would enter into the church, (go up) on top of it, and they would see all places, when there was fighting. (4) It had a 'nose'.[1] (From) the nose one came down to opposite the door. The door consisted of a large stone. A large man could not enter through it, unless he stooped like this to enter. (5) This had a (symbolic) meaning, namely, as they say in Arabic, ʾəḥtərām, that is (to show) respect. When (a person) stooped like this, it was like a person bowing before a king. He would bow in the same way in order to enter the door of the church. The door of the church was very small. They would hold vigil in it (the church). (6) We had seven bishops in our village. They were all laid in one grave in (the church of) Saint Qayyoma. When Ṣaddām came up he destroyed even that church. (7) But, by the strength of God, Dure will never be forgotten. They have already built it again. They have rebuilt (the church of) Saint George. Many people of the village have gone up there again. By the strength of God they will (continue to) go up and it will become better from day to day.

   (8) In the year 1914, when the First War began, the Christians who were in Turkey went to Iran. Those who were in Iraq went to Iran. They were forced to go there by the Russians, the English and the French, and (forced) by all of these (nations) to stay there. (9) In the year 1918 they returned from Iran. On the 16th of Tamuz (July) they returned from Iran and went to Baquba. They remained two years in Baquba. Then they went up and returned again to the villages. They went up to Turkey. (10) Ninety people went to the village (of Dure), ninety souls. We mean people, not families, ninety people. But God granted progeny among them and by now there have been born, I think, more than nine-hundred thousand people.

The Location of 'Ɛn-Nune

(1) 'Ɛn-Nune is situated in—there are mountains on one side and on the other. The ones on the left are (known as) ba-roža ('in the sun'). The ones on the right are (known as) ṭalana. (2) (The word) ṭalana means 'shady', since when the sun rose, the mountains became like that. When the sun shone, there was shade on the mountains. That is, there was no sun, until midday, when the sun would reach (it). Then there was sun on the ṭalana (mountain). In the morning, until after lunch, the sun was behind the mountain and there was shade at the front of the mountain. There was no sun. So they called it ṭalana ('shady'). (3) The other was ba-roža ('in the sun'). That was on the other side, on the lefthand side. Behind us there are the mountains that are between Iraq and Turkey. This is because behind 'Ɛn-Nune, that is to the North, there are not any other villages, but there are the mountains that are between Iraq and Turkey. (4) So 'Ɛn-Nune was close to Ashitha. (There was) trade…my father, may he rest in peace, used to tell how my grandfather would conduct trade with Ashitha. From Ashitha people came and conducted trade with Barwar, then returned. My late grandfather had many customers, that is they plied a trade together. (5) It is situated—that is Maye, the village of Maye, then Dɛrəške, then 'Ɛn-Nune, then Dure, then Iyyət and Bəšmiyaye until you reach the Zab. (6) We used to go to the Zab. I remember when we went up from Baghdad to the village of 'Ɛn-Nune, we would go up to the banks of the Zab. We would take a sheep with us and slaughter it there, on the trip, on the banks of the Zab. We would make a fire and roast it there. (7) We would take drink with us. From morning until seven or eight in the evening we sat there—it depended on the summer—the sun would set and then we would return again (to 'Ɛn-Nune). We indeed took drink with us and roasted meat. We took the sheep from (somewhere) there on the way. We would slaughter it there. We would sit, make merry, swim and dance. Life was very enjoyable.

The Name 'ɛn-Nune

GK: Where did the name 'ɛn-Nune originate from?

(8) In truth I have seen, as far as I remember, only small fish. I have not seen large fish. Perhaps before our time, since once the river was large. The river was large. (9) In recent years the water has begun to diminish in the river. Sometimes in summer a person could walk in it and come out the other side. But formerly they used to say that if the foot of people slipped a little, they would fall and the river would carry them away and they would die in the river, drown, so abundant was the water. (10) Formerly perhaps it was four metres, or five metres (deep), in winter. That is the river was as large as that. But we, when we were young, as far as I remember, we did not see large fish. We only saw small fish. (11) Why do they call it 'Spring of fishes' ('ɛn-Nune). In truth, I do not know why. Perhaps formerly there were large fish in it.

The Origin of the Family of Hɛdo

(12) Where did we come from? We, the family of Hɛdo, came from Upper Ṭiyare. They were seven brothers. I shall tell you this (story), perhaps you have not heard it. (13) They were seven brothers. They had domestic animals. They had a sister. They had a sister. When they went to cultivate (in the fields), Kurds came, from the village that was adjacent to them. They attacked their house and seized their sister while they were not there. (14) When they came back, they went to that village of the Kurds. They took their animals, all of their animals. They went to that village of the Kurds, fought with them and took their animals. They took their revenge ten times over. (15) But what did they say? They said 'We cannot live here any more, since the Kurds will be upon us every day, attacking us and they will come every day to harry us'. So, they took themselves off. (16) Their mules—the shoe of their mules' feet was made of iron. They put it on backwards. They tied them (the shoes) on and set off from there, so that the Kurds would not know where they had gone. (17) The seven brothers, one of them came and settled in Barwar. One of them settled in Alqosh. One of them settled in Aradən. That is these seven brothers were dispersed to all places. (18) Of course we are talking about something (that happened) perhaps five hundred years ago. Perhaps four hundred, five hundred years ago. We also have a brother in Aradən, from the family of Hɛdo, and in Alqosh we have a brother from the family of Hɛdo.

The Church of Saint Sawa

(19) The old church of Saint Sawa was built about seven hundred and fifty or eight hundred years ago. Behind the church there was a place for burying the deceased. (20) Recently I went and saw that the church was completely destroyed. The place in which they used to baptize us, like a small bath, dug into the earth, where all of us who were born were baptized—that has survived. (21) I took a photograph of it. That place where we were baptized, of course all our ancestors were baptized there. That was not blown up. When they blew up the church, that remained. (22) Now as for that place, they made a fence for it, but they want to make a bigger fence for it, for that place that remains from the church, and that cemetery. They will make a large fence for all of these, but they will leave them there so that people can make a pilgrimage to them. (23) But the new church of Saint Sawa has not been built now in its (original) place. A new church has been built above it.

Informant: Nanəs Bənyamən (ʾƐn-Nune)

(1) ʾƐn-Nune lies in the land of Barwar near to the border of Turkey, between two mountains. In front of it there is a mountain and behind it there is a mountain, high mountains. On all sides of the place where ʾƐn-Nune is situated there is a plain divided into let's say fields. (2) Everybody in ʾƐn-Nune has fields, which he cultivates, or he makes into an orchard or whatever he wants. They were his property. This was the village of ʾƐn-Nune. (3) What is the origin of the village of ʾƐn-Nune?[1] According to what we have heard, according to what we heard when we were young, we can say that, from as many as two hundred years, that is two hundred years ago, perhaps more—I can say that our folk have told how ʾƐn-Nune dates from up to two hundred and fifty years ago. (4) In ʾƐn-Nune there were a few houses, only a small number in ʾƐn-Nune, belonging to people who were in the mountains, working for their livelihood, so that they could live. We who were in the mountains were the Assyrian people who were in Babylon of old. (5) After Babylon fell, the places of the Assyrians like Moṣul (i.e.) Nineveh, like Nimrud, and the places that were our land, were all scattered by wars and by kingdoms that came and attacked the Assyrians of Nineveh. So we fled and hid in the mountains from tyranny and slaughter, and began to form ourselves into villages. (6) Now, ʾƐn-Nune two hundred and fifty years ago consisted of only a few families, a few people. Only a few had settled there. I cannot say, I do not know exactly, since there was no history. There was no writing at that time (stating) from where the people had come. (7) A few tribes, a few families settled in ʾƐn-Nune. We call my tribe—we are called the house of Hɛdo. We came from Ṭiyare, from Turkey. How did we come? They used to relate that there were seven brothers in a village in Turkey called Ʒspistən.[2] Everybody around this village of Ʒspistən were Kurds, were Muslims. (8) These seven brothers had a sister. The leader of the Muslims, we say sheikh, the leader, was a young man. The girl was beautiful. He said to them 'I shall marry that Christian girl. I shall marry her'. He came to ask her hand from her brothers. He said 'Give that girl to me'.

[1] Literally: From where has the village of ʾƐn-Nune come?
[2] This names is likely to be a corruption of Sarəspiðo or Sarəspiðon, a village in Upper Ṭiyare.

(9) But it is not our custom that a Christian girl marries a Muslim. It was not our custom and is not so until now. So what did they do? They regarded it as very shameful to give their only sister to this amir, to this Muslim, to this sheikh. What did they do? (10) They said to him 'Come tomorrow by yourself and we shall let you know. Do not bring people with you. It is shameful for us (to have) people (come) when you are Muslim and we are Christian. It is shameful. Tomorrow we shall tell you and we shall give you our sister'. (11) There were people with him. Around them there was an army and I don't know what, frightening them. What did they do? They made a plan. They said 'We shall kill him and flee in the night'. (12) What was their profession? They put metal (shoes) on the feet of mules, we say shoeing, shoeing of mules. People put metal on the feet of mules, don't they? This was their profession. They were blacksmiths, they had a blacksmiths' shop there. Everybody brought mules there for them to shoe. (13) What did they do? At night they had six or seven mules, all shoed backwards, that is they were not put on straight. They put on the shoes of their mules back to front. That is, if a mule walks like this, if it walks on its way, you would say that it has gone like that.[3] They made them like that. (14) The next day he came. When he came into their house, they seized him and killed him. They killed that aghah, that amir, and dragged him and threw him into a room (in) their (house). They hid him there. (15) They put all their household goods on the back of their mules and fled. They fled from that village of Ǝspistən, through Upper Ṭiyare and Lower Ṭiyare, they fled night and day. They came and settled in villages. They did not settle together. They were seven brothers. (16) One settled in Maye. One settled in Dɛrəške. One settled in ʾƐn-Nune. One settled in Araðən. One settled in Alqoš. One in Ašiθa, one settled in Ašiθa. Each of them stayed in a (different) place and they hid their sister. (17) We—that is my tribe, the house of Hɛdo, came from Ǝspistən and settled in ʾƐn-Nune. This was not very recently, perhaps it was something like a hundred and fifty years, a hundred and fifty years ago. (18) My mother used to relate that our church, Saint Sawa, was built after those people of ours settled in ʾƐn-Nune. That is, when those people of ours from Ǝspistən came and settled in ʾƐn-Nune, they started to built the church of Saint Sawa.

Weddings

(1) In the old days we in the villages used to have our own ways (of doing things), like, for example, the way we used to hold weddings. First of all we would go, the family of the groom would go to the house of the bride's family. They would first politely make an announcement to them saying 'We want to ask (for the hand of) your daughter for our son.' They would say 'We shall see'. (2) Why (did they do this)? In the old days it was not the practice to ask the girl. The father of the girl would see the mother of the girl, they (both parties) would see each other. Again they (the family of the boy) would go and say 'What have you decided?[1] How far (have you got with your thoughts)?' That is 'What decision have you made?[2] Do you agree or not?' (3) It would take time. Often it would take almost five or six months or more. In those days it was rather difficult. Moreover they did not give (brides) from one tribe to another. Everybody used to have his own tribe and as far as possible they would give the girl (in marriage) to (somebody in) her own tribe. So, it took time for such (arrangements to be made). (4) Afterwards, if they had made a decision, they would say 'We agree'. Two people from the family of the groom would go to the family of the bride. They would sit, talk and enjoy themselves. 'With great respect (we announce to you) that we want to form a family relationship with you.' (Or they would say) 'We would be very happy to renew the family relationship.' (5) Perhaps previously they had become relatives of one another. They would ask each other and would say 'Yes we agree'. After some time they would deposit tokens (of betrothal). What are these tokens? This is what is called 'a trusted hand', 'a trusted hand'.[3] They would deposit some money. At that time money was in short supply.

(6) They would deposit let's say a sum of five dinars, or thereabouts, according to their ability (to pay), you see.[4] These become the token (of betrothal). Further time would pass, a few months. A few months would pass, then at that point they would say 'Let us make the betrothal.' This is the act of betrothing, that is they would hold (the ceremony) of the 'trusted hand'[5] then afterwards would proceed to hold the betrothal.

(7) As for the betrothal, they would make food. The family of the bride would make this food. They would prepare food. We have various types of food. They would bring one of the 'white small cattle' (sheep), as we say, white small cattle. There was white small cattle (sheep) and black small cattle (goats). They would slaughter sheep. As for goats.... They would prepare meat and cook it. Then they would cook rice. It is called qawurma. This rice, in which they put the meat, this is called qawurma. (8) They would go there (to the bride's house) and on that day they would decide on money. They would sit and speak, then they would start the bidding, as we say. He (a representative of the bride's family) would say—in the old days, at that time money was scarce, (one requested) from twenty to thirty dinars, perhaps fifty, depending on the circumstances of that man, on how much he was able to pay—he would say 'We want fifty dinars'. 'Yes', they say 'fifty dinars', they say 'Yes, that's fine'. (9) Another man would stand up (and say) 'There is (the obligation of) respect (for our family relationship), we are becoming relatives.' He says 'What do you, so-and-so, say?' He says 'I shall deduct ten dinars.' 'Thank you very much'. Then they would clap hands and sing. (The clapping) would stop and after that (one would say) 'What do you say?' Again after that they would deduct something else. (10) The family of the bride would say to him, they would say 'For the sake of respect (we shall decrease the amount).' I do not know what, '(We are) relatives, we are becoming friends and relatives. (We should do so) so that we do not feel anger with each other.'[6] He would then proceed to deduct five more, so that thirty-five remained. The father of the groom would rise and shake the hand of the father of the bride. He would shake his hand (to confirm) that this has taken place.

(11) From then onwards they would sing and dance. Some would sing diwane. They would sit and say diwane and sing. The songs of our land there were beautiful. There was arak. At that time they brought drink. We produced that drink, arak, there. (12) We produced arak from raisins, because at that time there were no dates there—they were called qazbe. So, they produced arak with raisins, raisins and grapes. As for the production of arak, they used to bring pots, they would put down the pots and put water into them. Then they would cover them and place them in a warm place, which we call a goma (basement). In order for it to be warm they would cover them. It would take about forty or fifty days. (13) For when (did they prepare the arak)? For the day on which what we call the betrothal took place. For that day people would bring arak. Twenty, thirty, forty people would sit singing and dancing. They would bring arak, they would serve (food) and they would drink. They would make snacks, meat dishes, kebabs and the like. (14) As for arak, there was (a pot called a) masina. A masina was made from clay. Those things[7] they would put in the masina. The masina had a small glass. They would serve it and drink it without water. They would drink that drink without water. This would take let's say two hours, two to three hours. Afterwards they would make merry, dancing and singing. Then they would bring the food. (15) As for the food, they would have cooked qawurma, rice, meat-balls. There was bread which we called zeðaye. The zeðaya was made out of wheat. They would sow the wheat…in Autumn they would sow it. Many people sowed it in Autumn. In Spring, in May or June, they would harvest it. They would harvest it, thresh it and take it down to the water-mill. They would grind it and it would become flour. (16) They would bring the flour home. There were women who knew how to bake and they kneaded it.[8] There was a large dish, (on which) they kneaded it. Of course they kneaded it together with water. They put it aside for about an hour and it gradually rose, as we say. They would put yeast in it and it rose. After it rose, they would say 'Its time (has come) for baking'. (17) They would take it to the ovens. There was an oven, as we say, which was made specially for this. There were women in the village whose profession was this, not all of them baked. She (the baker-woman) would bake it and they gave her something, a loaf of bread, two loaves, and she made a livelihood by this.

(18) After this they sat, ate and again sang and drank until it was night. At night they would hold evening celebrations and then everyone would go to their home. After that several months would pass. Perhaps the person, that is the groom, the man, was not there. He was working in the towns, for example. (This passage of time) was because we always used to hold our weddings in Autumn. (19) When was Autumn? It was September, October until November, we called these Autumn. This is because in those days people would have worked in summer and gathered food, gathered various things and prepared them for that time, then at that time (in the Autumn) they were more free and there was not much work. They would say 'Such-and-such a day is (that of) the wedding'. (20) Two weeks beforehand they would invite (people). They would go to the villages and make invitations. There was no (invitation) card at that time. It was not the practice to take a piece of paper or the like. A man would go to villages that were near us. He would take a bag with him, in which he put bread, and would go from house to house making invitations. (21) 'Greetings to you'. 'You are welcome'. 'You are invited to the wedding of the son of so-and-so on such-and-such a day.' All the family was likewise invited. There were two or three villages in one direction where the man would go (first). (22) We had five or six (neighbouring Christian) villages, which they would divide (into groups).[9] He would go to a house and say 'You are invited'. 'The wedding of whom?' 'It is so-and-so'. He (the guest) would say 'Thank you very much'. (23) The parents of the groom would start making preparations. They would put out arak for the wedding, since they invited many people to the wedding. They would bring sheep, slaughter them and make qalya (roasted meat preserved in fat). They would bring rice and other things (and continue thus) until the day of the wedding. (24) (When) we had a wedding there, there was the drum and pipe, as we called it. The drum and pipe, these were mainly (played by) Christians and also some Muslims who were there. They would bring these in the evening, they would come on Saturday.

(25) A day before there was what we call 'the bathing of the groom'. The šadəsta (pre-wedding party)[10] was held on that day. Everybody came and sat in the house of the groom. They would enjoy themselves, dance and sing. The next day was the bathing of the groom. At the bathing of the groom the drum and pipe band would come.

(26) People would gather together wearing (fine) clothes and bathe him. Before they bathed the groom, they would bring a small boy. This also was symbolic. They would wash his head and bathe him. Finally they would bathe the groom. They would come up (from the river)[11] and dress him in his clothes. (27) Then they would sit down. They would have made the evening meal during the day. They would have made duxwa. Duxwa is made from diluted yoghurt and barley, with meat and so on put in it. It took time (to make),[12] two or three hours. We used to make duxwa there. (28) In the evening we would go to the house of the bride. We would go to the house of the bride. They would sit on mules, at that time (they sat) on mules. They called it a koðənta ('female mule'). They went to the house of the bride. Whether it was in the village or in another village, they would go and sit there in the house of the bride. (29) Also there there would be the drum and pipe and merriment into the night. The groom and the best man—he would take a best man with him, the best man would be together with him—the best man and the groom would stay at the house of the bride, that is in a house nearby. Yes, we call this the house of the bride. (30) In the early morning they would hold perform the blessing (of the wedding ceremony) there. A priest would come. In the house they would tie the band. We say 'They blessed it'. This was beforehand. Afterwards, after they performed the blessing and were finished, the bride and the groom sat down together with the best man and the bridesmaid. Then people would dance and sing, until it was almost early morning. (31) Then they would bring breakfast and they would eat breakfast. They would bring…there used to be jajik, cheese, all made there, honey, duwana—they made duwana from flour and butter, pure butter, the butter of sheep, good quality sheep's butter. At that time there was no (illness), there was no stomachache, no backache, one did not have (high blood) pressure.

(32) They ate breakfast and finished everything until it was lunchtime. Before the groom began, they would lay out the breakfast, on the table and on the ground, as was the practice there.[13] They would lay out the breakfast and the groom would say 'I shall not eat'. This is a symbolic act of ours. From times of old they would say that the groom will not eat.

[11] The bathing of the groom took place in the river.

(33) He would act pompously. We made tricks, laughed, sang and enjoyed the occasion. We would say 'Eat!' and he would say 'I am not hungry', in fun, things like that. This also was a form of merriment of ours, and a symbolic act of ours. At that time they would say 'How much (do you want) in order for you to eat?' He would say 'I want ten dinars'. (34) Then he would pompously puff himself up again and say to them 'I shall not eat', I don't know why.' They would say 'Eat! It's time. It's got cold. Eat!' 'I don't know why (but I shall not eat)'. Then they would give him ten dinars and he would eat. (This would go on) until lunchtime. (35) But I have forgotten something here. The bride, when she came, her face was covered. The bride's face was covered. They brought something that was like a cloth, like a kerchief. They put it like this over her face. It is called a xəppo ('cover'). It is called a xəppo. The groom does not see the bride. (36) They sit there together until one or two o'clock, then they have to go to the house of the groom's family. Beforehand they eat lunch. They would have prepared xumṣa. This food is for the family of the bride. They give this food to them and they finish (eating) in the early morning. Beforehand there is dancing, singing, drinking, the drum and pipe. The people would be gathered and prepared for that time. (37) After eating, they bring a mule, we call it a koðənta ('female mule'). They decorate it and put on it a saddle blanket or the like, and put on it a clean cloth. As for the bride and groom, a relative sits with the bride, he sits at the front and he would put her behind him, on the back of the mule. The groom also (has) his own mule, and the best man…they were all on mules at that time, you see. Some were on foot, even if the villages were far off. (38) At that time they move to the house of the groom. At that time (they do what) is called 'clapping hands for the bride', that is we would take her around various places, whether her house was close or far. This is called 'clapping hands for the bride'. That is, they take the bride around towards her house and come to her house. After they arrive at the house—beforehand they have prepared a tree. (39) We used to call the tree a thorn-tree. They used to decorate the tree. They put apples on it. They put bread on it. They put balls on it. They decorated it with many beautiful things. Where was this tree? They put it up on the roof. The groom and the best man went up on the roof. (40) The bride would come to the door of the house. There they made a vessel that we call a zawərta ('pot'). They put raisins in it, walnuts, terebinth nuts, some sweets and other things. This is placed at the door before the bride enters. Before the bride enters she makes (the sign of) the cross in oil.

(41) They would bring oil and she would make (the sign of) the cross on the door, (to indicate) that 'I place my trust in you. I am becoming a member of this family'. This is a symbolic act. It is a sign that 'This is my house from now on'. At that time the bride would break the pot and enter the house. (42) After that they would sell the tree. The people were all below and he (the groom) was high up on the roof, all the people were waiting below. They sold the tree, as we say. His relatives came and (one) said 'Hey, everbody, who will buy the tree?' One relative of his would say 'I shall buy it for ten' and they would receive ten dinars. Another would say 'I shall buy it for fifteen' and they would receive fifteen. This was mainly for fun, you see. (43) In the end, he (the groom) would take the tree and they would knock it against the eaves, as we call them, the eaves. The walnuts that were on it, the apples, the quinces and such things all fell down. Then the people gathered them up. They set up the tree there. After that, when the bride had come, they remained there that day. (44) In the evening there were wedding celebrations. People got up and danced. Afterwards, after the woman has become official there, that is she enters the house, the priest comes and ties the band. The band is a symbol (expressing) trust in the family (and that) she is becoming (a member) of the family. (45) The priest and the deacon who are there pray, tie the band and (do) everything. They (the bride and groom) sit before the band, which is placed either on a sofa or something else, or on the ground. They sit before the band and the people get up and dance and sing, all day long. (46) The wedding celebrations last almost three days, (until) Monday, the next day, let's say, since in our community weddings took place on Saturday. On Sunday the people are at the bride's house and then return. On Monday it (the wedding) is at the groom's house. This day is the official wedding. The people get up the next morning and gather together. (47) They went (there), each (from) his home, they came from the villages, from the villages, all dressed in the šalla.[14] They dressed up, with hats, in which they put feathers. If somebody had a dagger, he put on the dagger. They dressed up and indeed the clothes were very beautiful. This splendid event took place on that day, since they were all very joyful.

(48) Subsequently, on the same day, there was what is called 'the lunch of the groom'. Everybody would have cooked something, one person rice, one stuffed vine leaves, another red rice,[15] another white rice. Everybody cooked something. This is called 'the lunch of the groom'. This also was a gift for the groom. (49) They would have brought sweets to be scattered (over the newly weds). We had (such a custom) of scattering sweets. A woman from among the relatives brings them. They bring the lunch, then go to the groom and bride and kiss his head and the head of the bride. Some people scatter sweets over them. In this way they bless them, according to our custom, they bless them. (50) They sit and in the evening all gather and go down (to dance). Afterwards, after the people have eaten all the lunch, they bring the bride out and make her dance. People come up to them and take them down to a large space outside. They put the groom and bride together side by side[16] and everybody dances. This day also[17] the wedding celebrations last until evening. (51) The next day the celebrations gradually come to an end. The bride stays there until the seventh day, which is called '(the time) she has begun (her functions of a wife)'. Yes, the seventh day is called '(the time) she has begun'. The bride and the groom—some of the family, some relatives, go to the house of the bride. They go to the house of the bride and spend the night there. They did this in the old days, it is not like that now. But in the old days this was the custom. The groom and bride stay there until Sunday. Then they all return home, everybody goes to his home.

Easter

(52) Easter in our community in the villages was indeed very beautiful. Generally we went down (to the church) at night or in the evening. We had a fast, that is the festival came after a fast. The fast is fifty days. After people fast for fifty days, they would paint eggs. They would prepare them on Saturday evening. They would have prepared the eggs beforehand, each person prepared them himself.

(53) On Saturday evening they prepared themselves to go down (to church) for the Easter (vigil), because Easter was at night. They went to the vigil, as we called it. Most people went to the vigil, since it was there in the village. In the village the church was nearby. They had tallow candles, everybody had tallow candles. Then they prayed the vigil, they began the prayers. (54) Then, after about an hour had passed, the resurrection would be celebrated.[18] What is this called?: The time when the resurrection has taken place. They keep vigil until the resurrection takes place. The priest stands and everybody has a tallow candle in his hand. They come up one after another. (55) Generally we hold it (this ceremony) outside. It was very beautiful and pleasant. I remember well. It was very nice. (When) the resurrection was celebrated,[19] the priest would have stood at the front and the deacons behind him. Everybody came up and they touched his head with a tallow candle and said 'The resurrection of our Lord. Our Lord has arisen'. (This went on) until everybody had finished. (56) It took time, perhaps an hour or more would pass. The people were joyful. Then they began to take communion. All this was at night, that is in the early morning. After the resurrection ceremony had finished, before they began to take communion—the church was near the cemetery, the cemetery. The dead people, they lay in what is called the cemetery.[20] The people would go (there). (57) Each person has a dead (family member). He would light a tallow candle and put it by his head[21] and press it (down on the grave). They made two or three small tallow candles, they made small pieces and placed them, stuck them onto the head of the grave. This was because every man, of course, had a dead (family member). Every family went to his dead, that is to the cemetery, placed (a tallow candle) for him and lit it. They also prayed for him. (58) Then they returned, went back into the church and began the communion mass. The next day—at that time everybody would have brought an egg with him. The egg was red, of course. This was a symbol. There were many people. When the communion is over, they go out into the courtyard and begin to knock eggs together. We call this 'knocking eggs', that is smashing the eggs of one another and breaking them. They would strike eggs together, we call it 'striking eggs'.

(59) Then, when the egg broke, one would say 'Turn it round!' and (the opponent struck) also the other side.[22] If both (sides) of one of the eggs broke, he would give it to the other person to take it from him. He has won it, as we say. After they finish—people would have brought there what we call kade. The kade were made from flour and butter, and many had duwana (cake paste) in them, is that not so? Yes, they were (made of) duwana, flour and the like. (60) They brought all these there and people shared them out. This was also a symbolic act. They brought eggs and people gave to one another. They gather there, bless one another (with greetings of the season) and enjoy themselves, and so forth. If there are people who have come from other villages, each person would take some of his relatives and take them up to his home for breakfast. (61) After they had finished and were ready…in the old days there (in our land) we used to go the house of the (village) head—the head is 'the man of the village', as we call him—and to the house of the priest (to offer Easter blessings). The people would gather and would gradually become five, ten, up to fifteen, sometimes they would reach twenty (in number), then they would call on each house, one after the other, you see. (62) (They would say) 'May your festival be blessed. Greetings' and they would sit. Then they would bring drink, arak and some wine, and they would sing and enjoy themselves. They were all dressed in festive clothes and the like, very smart, since that day was a joyful occasion. (This went on) until lunchtime, midday. At that time, wherever they had got to, at midday they all ate. (63) They say xădaya ('lunch'), they would have made lunch, rice, soup, meat and so on, also drink, everything, and they ate. Then they would again start on the festival visits, that is they would make festival visits to other people, until evening, until the next day. The festival was two days. They were busy (in this period) with these things. This is, as we say, the festival of resurrection ('Easter'), a really big symbolic event. We call this the 'Great Festival', it is the 'Great Festival'.

(64) During the 'Great Festival', Monday was a (time of) memorial, it was a (time of) memorial. What is this memorial? The people, all the families, each family cooks something. This is rice, duxwa, stuffed vine leaves, stew or gərðo—generally it is called gərðo.[23] Gərðo is made of yoghurt. Yoghurt is made from milk, milk of sheep.

[22] Literally: 'also the other side, that is side'. Two different words are used for 'side'.
[23] I.e. bušala and gərðo are alternative names for the same dish.

(65) They bring the milk to the house. They draw milk and bring it to the house. They congeal (the milk to make) the yoghurt. They put it on the fire, it warms up and they add a congealing agent (rennet). It all warms up and becomes yoghurt. They make the yoghurt into gərðo. What is gərðo? Rice and yoghurt. They cook it. They generally make gərðo. (66) At that time in our village we had a mulberry tree. The mulberry is in a big, spacious place and many people gather there. This was 'before the door of the house' (i.e. outside), as we say. Everybody would bring his own lunch and set it out there. People would sit there and would have prepared a place (for the food). (67) On this occasion they would put out wood and sit on it. They would sit on wood of poplar trees, as we called them. They would have lined up all the food, each (item) placed beside the other. Whoever brought stew would make what we call a maqora 'hole' in the middle of it. He would put a small dish in it, like this, and a woman would bring, in another vessel, butter, which she would put in it. She would put butter, date syrup or cake paste in it. They call this gərðo. (68) Then people would come. If a priest was there, they would pray and everybody would eat. This was a (sign of) respect. They did this on the second day of the Great Festival. (When) they finished (the festival), they enjoyed themselves, singing, making merry, dancing and so on also that (second) day. Afterwards, they went home. This is the Great Festival. This is the customary way of celebrating[24] the Great Festival.

The Saint's Festival

(69) A saint's festival is a memorial, it is a day (of memorial). Many people gather. People gather for the saint's festival. This is the memorial of the saint of the church, his memorial. At that time, many people come from outside. They would have dedicated themselves, dedicated some symbolic item to the church, a gift, something. (70) In our (the church) of Mar Sawa, in 'En-Nune, people would have given what we call devotional gifts. What is a devotional gift? A sheep. They bring a sheep and slaughter it that day. Many people came from the villages and slaughtered sheep. Many people would have prepared themselves for that day. On many occasions they slaughtered ten head of sheep. We call it 'head' (of sheep), on many occasions thirty, twenty. This was a dedicatory sacrifice. They would slaughter it (the object of this sacrifice).

After breakfast they prepare the sacrifice that has been slaughtered for lunch. At that time there is constant dancing, singing, serving of drinks, arak, and jollity. These things are also customary features of the festival, even now. Many people hold the festival in a very beautiful way. (72) They respect it for the sake of the church. The people gathered together. Many people would have prepared themselves for that event. We in 'ɛn-Nune have a saint's festival. Of course now it is not as it was in the old days. In the old days people would wear (special) clothes. They would make it a decorative occasion, very beautiful, very fine. Now circumstances have changed. It is not like formerly, but the festival is the same festival, the same respect (is shown), everything.

Ploughing

(73) At that time (a cultivator) had a pair of oxen. He would cultivate with a pair of oxen. When he cultivated with them, he cultivated his own lands and also for other people. He would take something small, some money from the people (as his fee), since not everybody had oxen. People would cultivate wheat, they would cultivate millet, they would cultivate beans. In the old days there was rice, chickpeas. They used to cultivate all such things in the old days and they would live off this. There were not many things that they bought. (74) The person who had the oxen — how did the oxen cultivate? There was a plough. The farmer who had the pair of oxen, he had (them) with him and he would cultivate with a plough. What is a plough? It is made from wood. It had a blade. The thing we call the blade is iron. It is a blade of iron. He used to cultivate with it. He would make his livelihood.[25]

The Cultivation of Apples (1)

(75) Afterwards, people in truth changed their livelihood and began to cultivate apples. They began to cultivate apples.[26] They were successful with apples. The country changed (and agriculture became difficult), but the cultivation of apples was easier (than that of other crops). They, nevertheless, required a lot of work. Until now people's livelihood is made by apples. There is very little (field) cultivation. They used to cultivate those things in the old days to make a livelihood.[27]

The Cultivation of Rice

(76) As for the sowing of rice, the cultivation of rice—the ground was (left) empty. Three or four days beforehand, they would irrigate it so that it would become quite soft. They cultivated this beginning in March, April or May, in such (months) as these, since by summer it would be rice. They would put water onto it. They would bring oxen and cultivate it. We call this making 'soft mud beds'. This is not called cultivating, it is called making soft mud beds. (77) They would make soft mud beds and cultivate them. Afterwards,[28] five or six people, five or six men, would come and make paddy fields. What is the purpose of these paddy fields? So that the irrigation of the rice was easier, so that everybody would know how much water would go into his paddy field. One or two days after that they would come and fill them with water and would come and scatter rice (in them). (78) The rice one day beforehand was softened in a sack (with water). They would bring it and go and scatter it. Scattering, that is they would scatter rice. After they scattered it, water had to be on it constantly. It would take a week, two weeks, then the rice would start to germinate, until it matured and grew high, before producing ears (of seed), as we say, producing ears,[29] that is before the seed develops in it. After it grew high, the women would go to weed. What is 'weeding'? Weeding is…there were several plants that they took out of the rice, so that they did not affect it, blighting the rice so that it would be weak. The women gathered it all up with their hands. They entered into the water. They would see snakes there. How the women would be afraid of the snakes! When this happened, some grasped the snake and killed it. They were very courageous. Others were afraid.

[26] The cultivation of apples was introduced in the 1960s.
[27] Literally: so that they could live.
[28] I.e. after preparing the soft mud beds.
[29] The verb is denominal, derived from šəble 'ears of seed'.

(79) They cleared the rice (of weeds) until it gradually grew tall. It took one month, two or three and then it became brown. After it became brown, we say that it is harvest time. They would drain the water.[30] After draining the water, they would go and harvest it. They would go and harvest it and, after harvesting it, they would transfer it from that land and take it to another place, which was called the 'threshing floor'. (80) When they took it to the threshing floor from that ground, they would lay down what we called a 'cloth'—we called it a 'cloak'. They would put the cloak on one side, and they would put on the cloak the heads of the rice, we call them 'seed heads', 'seed heads'. They would roll it up (bringing) each half (together), so that when they transported the grass, the rice, they would not fall, so that the rice would not fall along the way. (81) This was because they put it on the back of mules. Some carried it on their back and brought it up to the threshing floor. There were places far away and places nearby. People would deposit (the rice) there in the form of a huðala ('stack of produce'), as we called it. It was called a huðala. They would bring it (and wait) four or five days, while (in the meantime the produce) was warmed (in the sun), until the turn of each person came. This was because they had their turns, one after the other, it is called 'turn'. (82) Then it is the day of what we call dwara ('the grinding of the grains'). In the evening they would go and untie the rice. What does the untying involve? We would put it on the threshing floor and spread it out. They call that 'untying'. The seed head of the rice plant would be upright, as if they were in a row, as we say, with everything arranged. (83) The next day, in the morning, we would get up early and take oxen (to the threshing floor), six or seven oxen. They call that dwara. When we took the oxen, we would tether them. They had a beam (across) their necks made of wood. They called it a wooden qaṭira, (fixed) to their necks, with tethers tying it to the mouth of the bull, so that it did not eat any of the rice, and they would go around. (84) (It was called) dwara, that is the oxen would turn round. They were tied together. One of them was called the leader. The leader, that is it would make the (other) oxen walk around. It took four hours, five hours. All the time they gathered the wood (husks) of the rice and they made it into hay. They gathered it into an armful and shook it so that the rice did not remain in it. They shook it.

(85) The women stood and shook it. Every ten minutes or so, they would take some from it with a threshing fork. They would bring it and place it on one side. The women would gather it and shake it with the shaking (just mentioned) and put it into a pile behind their back. Another man comes and ties it up into bundles (darze), as we called them, in order for it to remain for cattle fodder for the winter. (86) The man would remain there, then they would come and winnow it, so that impurities did not remain. At the end of the evening, after they finished, they would bring a sack and put (the produce) in it. They would bring away five sacks, six sacks, ten sacks and take them up to the house on mules, on a she mule, you see. (87) What is a winnowing fork (məlxawa)? The winnowing fork was made from wood. It had a long handle. Its end had three pieces of wood, small like this. It would spread out the rice, or various other things, everything. They called this a 'winnowing fork' (məlxawa). This is the story of rice, from where it begins, and it ends here.

(88) After that they dry the rice out. They would take it up to the roof, take it up to the roof of the house. They spread it out. It became thoroughly dry. After it dried, they gathered it together. After they gathered it, it (the process) was over. (89) In the house there was what we called a 'small window' (kawe). A place was prepared with a small window. They put the rice in this small window in order for it to run down into the house. This all took place in the čeri months (October and November), as we call them, the čeri months.[31] They were undertaking (this) in the season of what we call the 'water-mill'. (90) Also the water-mill was by turns. What is the job of the water-mill? As for the story of grinding the rice, they would install a grind wheel, of a water-mill, a grind wheel of a water-mill. There was a stone (grind wheel), which was for wheat, with which they made flour, but the one for rice was of wood. It was for exactly the same thing, but of wood. They put rice (onto it) so that it would not make it flour and not break it. It was set up (for grinding). (91) In the grind wheel there were bore holes so that the wheat would enter between one wheel and the other, so that its husk would be removed. But the grain itself was not damaged.[32] It came out (of the mill) and they gathered it and brought it up to the house. They would throw out its husks, it was called 'chaff'

(92) When they came and brought the rice down to the water-mill, they would install a grind wheel. Which of the (types of) grind wheel was it? There was a grind wheel of wood and a grind wheel of stone. The grind wheel of wood is for rice, for if we installed a stone grind wheel, it would crush everything and it would become flour. Now with regard to the wood, it is made with a groove in it. (93) There are people whose job that is. They crush it (the rice) with it, that is they mill it with it, and it (the mill) sends forth rice on one side and chaff on the other side. They throw the chaff away. It is discarded, since it is of no use. They gather up the rice and take it up to the house. This is all there is to say about rice.[33] Thereafter they start cooking, everybody for himself.

The Cultivation of Wheat

(94) The cultivation of wheat is different. There is irrigated land and unirrigated land. Unirrigated land is without water. Rather, they sow it relying only on rainfall. They sow the wheat. The huwedi wheat they generally sow without irrigation, they call it 'unirrigated' (demi). They sow it in the mountains. There are places that are clear for sowing, such a place is always used for this purpose. (95) As for the (sowing place) in the farm land in the village, they sow wheat in this land, after the harvest of the rice. They call this (sowing) 'in place of the rice'. They harvest the rice. The place has become quite soft and they go and sow wheat in its place, since this takes place in the summer. In July or August, they begin to harvest the wheat plants. Wheat plants are easier (to harvest). (96) Wheat also is threshed. After they sow it and it grows, after they harvest it, they make what are called 'bundles' (darze), they make it into bundles. They bring also these to the threshing floor. When they thresh it, they bring oxen to thresh it. As I said regarding the rice, they fetch oxen and so forth, tie them together and they turn and thresh (the wheat). The wood of the wheat all becomes like straw, as we call it. The wheat grains stay on one side and this stays on the other side, that is straw, you see.

(97) (After) they have threshed everything and no more of its heads, as we call them, remain, none of such things remain, they let the oxen go. They wait for there to be wind and they do what we call winnowing. What is winnowing? They bring a winnowing fork. If there is wind, they raise it in the air. The wheat grains go onto one side and the straw goes onto the other. They separate. After the straw goes out on one side and the wheat grains on the other side, they bring a sack for the wheat grains and put them in it. (98) They bring sacks also for the straw and take it up to a place that has been prepared for it for the winter. They lay out the straw for the mule, for the cattle, for them to live off for the winter. They bring the straw up. Something that is made of wheat is, of course, bread. Bread is made of wheat. They take the wheat down to the water-mill. (99) They grind it with the stone grind wheel, as I said. Its grinding is with the stone grind wheel. After they grind it and it becomes flour, they take it up to the house, as I said, if they want to bake pitta breads from it or make thin breads, there being different types of bread. (100) A woman kneads it, together with water. She kneads it and they put yeast in it and leaven it. It takes an hour or so. The women know (about this), they place a hand on it and feel that it is leavened. They know about it. They take it to the oven . There is an oven that is prepared for this purpose. Then a woman bakes it. After she bakes it, she (the other woman) takes her pitta breads and gives one or two pitta breads to her (the baker woman).[34] She comes home and brings food and they eat.

Ovens

(101) The oven: After they bring the bread to the woman who bakes, she makes it into pitta breads. She spreads it out. First she makes it into balls and then spreads it out well. After that, she puts it into the oven. The oven is heated beforehand. They have put fire (in it), brought wood. It is heated well, (the wood becoming) hot and (the oven) red. (102) She (the baker woman) comes and presses (the flat bread) onto it, down below, inside, until it becomes brown. She knows how brown it has become. She takes them one by one and puts another in. (When) she finishes, four or five are laid out. She takes out whichever one is brown soonest. That one is finished and she puts in another in its place. This is called baking bread in the oven.

The Cultivation of Apples (2)

(103) The cultivation of apple trees is somewhat difficult. When you bring it (to be planted), we call it a sapling. You put the sapling in whatever land you like. If you want to plant it, you dig its place. You dig it, let's say a span or more than a span (in size). You put the sapling in this place and cover it over. Between the saplings you must leave about five steps, five paces, something like that, so that when they are big, they do not touch one another and they will yield more abundant fruit. (104) After a few years, even if the fruit is (still) bitter, after a year and a half it must be pruned, as we say. We must come and prune it and trim it and perform what is known as grafting, in order to make an apple tree bearing edible fruit. This requires one year. In the fourth year the apple tree produces fruit. (105) Each year you must dig around it. You must dig around it and place manure on it. What is manure? It is the muck of animals, of oxen, a mule, of sheep. You put manure on it, you see, in order that from year to year it grows better. When they become big, the work is a little more difficult. This is because, when they become big, the job to maintain them is bigger, and you must be very careful. (106) In summer, after it bears fruit, before (the apples) become ripe, you must apply chemical (insecticide), so that diseases do not afflict it, whereby it wilts or its leaves are spoilt and the apple tree is spoilt, and so forth. They did all these things. Indeed their livelihood was in this. They had a very good life by this, that is by the cultivation of apples. It (their life) is not difficult. It is easy. Their life is easier.

Preparations for Winter

(107) What is the life there like? When is summer? It is from March that people begin to work. Summer is (for) jobs, that is the time for working, all the summer is work, until the autumn. The autumn means October, November. From this time onwards, throughout four or five months, people are busy gathering, gathering for winter. Winter begins from November.

(108) It sometimes happens that a lot of snow falls. It sometimes happens that it rains all the time. People, in any case, are prepared. A person who has sheep or who has cattle has harvested grass. A person who has sheep would have harvested leaves. Those who keep mules have hay.[35] They gather everything for winter, since in winter there is never anything. From November onwards there is no grass. The sheep do not go up into the mountains to eat. (109) For there, in the summer, from May onwards we hire a shepherd for the sheep. What is a shepherd? Anybody who has small cattle, whether they are 'white small cattle' or 'black small cattle', that is whether they are goats or sheep. We hire a shepherd. We hire him for money, whatever they (agree to) give him for that. (110) He takes them in the early morning. All the people of the village muster and gather the sheep. He then goes up into the mountains, from the morning until the evening. He brings them back in the evening before the setting of the sun and the coming of darkness. Everybody has his own basement stable and a place prepared (for feeding), which we call a duna (feeding pen). This feeding pen is open (to the sky). The basement stable is inside and the feeding pen is outside. (111) This is all a job of the summer. (The care of) oxen is just the same. Oxen, a cow, we call these cattle. We hire a cowherd. What is this cowherd? He goes and fetches the cattle. Likewise early in the morning they milk a cow and take it up to the cattle so that they are collected in one place. The cowherd takes them and it is his job to take them to the mountains, graze them and bring them back by evening. (112) This is in summer. By the evening they have prepared grass in the farm-land. They bring them back and put food out for them. They milk them and shut them in the stable basement. This is (the activity of) the summer with regard to animals. Yet at that time they would have already made preparations, putting things in order and harvesting grass for the winter. (113) This is the case until October. In October (after) they have gathered the grass and what they had harvested and brought it home, it becomes dry and they stack it up.[36] This is called a huðala (fodder stack). They stack it up, it is called a fodder stack. For when (is this prepared)? For the winter, for their animals. On top of this fodder stack they put hay, since water does not seep through hay. What type of hay is it?[37] That of rice.

(114) Now there is no rice. Now, at that time (of year) they put plastic (on it), so that this plastic prevents the water from seeping down into what we call a fodder stack, for if water seeps in, it spoils. If it is spoilt, the cattle and animals remain without food. In the same way they prepare all the food, for example wheat, rice, millet, sesame, everything that they have sown. These are for people to eat in the winter, since in the winter there is no cultivation. (115) In general the practice was that these things were for people whereas the grass and such things were for their animals. (This continued) until March. In March Spring begins again. The animals go up to the mountains and, gradually, they eat any food that is left. This is a time of division between this (season) and the other. (116) They prepare everything for life in the winter. In summer until October they gather, as we say. We call it gathering. What is 'gathering'? 'Collecting'. What is 'collecting'? This means preparing for the winter, since in the winter the snow comes, the rain and the wind. One cannot go to places. Everybody is in his home and his animals are with him, in what we call the basement stable. We call this the basement stable. (117) He lays in food and sits (at home). The householder lays in food. Somebody who has flour takes it to the oven and they bake it. Then they return home and sit and so forth. During these two or three months they have no work. They only look after their animals and sit in the house, until March, when the Spring begins, then they begin to tend the apple trees, their farmlands and all their things.

(118) As I said, the sheep went up into the mountains in Summer. In Winter, mainly in September, people would go up into the mountains and cut down leaves, as we would say, everybody on his own land. What is the cutting down of leaves? They cut them down, one person cutting and throwing them on the ground, while the others were following behind him making small piles, so that they could gather them up. (119) After they finish, they say 'It is time that we go down (to the village)'. About an hour before (going down to the village), they gather up all the leaves and stack them behind a tree. They call this a garuta. They would construct it against a tree and press it down. Even if water ran down into it, it does not spoil, since when it is fresh, it is compact. This is called a garuta.

(120) When was this made for? For Winter. Since, in this way, when it rained or snowed in winter, they would have no concerns. (When) the snow came, people would start bringing down loads (of leaves) as they needed them.[38] They would come and put the load (on their back). They had a rope and a hair coat and they would carry it on their back. Whoever had a pack animal, would bring down his pack animal, that is a mule. (121) When there was snow, even a mule could not go up (into the mountains). So, what do they do? They carry (the loads) on their backs. A person has a rope which he lays down and he builds up (the load) on top of the rope, everybody as much as he can (carry), so that it is not too heavy. He then ties it up and puts it on his back. We call this a kɛrta (load). They would bring these (to feed the sheep). (122) Now, concerning the duna (animal feeding pen), sheep were kept in the duna. (The garuta) is built there (by the pen), they build it there. They wait for two or three days and then once again go up (to fetch loads). This is called a garuta. (When) they have cut down leaves for their sheep, they use it for the winter, together with other grasses that they have in the huðala (fodder stack). (123) A person who has sheep gives them rasa grass. People who have oxen give them hay.[39] Straw is (given) to mules and also cattle, if people have them, until Spring. (When) it is Spring, they gradually reduce the fodder and take the animals into the mountains, and they begin to graze, until the following Winter. They call this ṭarpa (gathering of leaves).

Mules

(124) The mule was something that was (as important to somebody as) 'his hands and his legs', as we say. We say the mule is 'his hand and his leg', that is people would live by the mule. They would go in a convoy. What is a convoy? They would take a load from village to village, from town to town. In the winter and in rain-storms it often took five hours. They called it a convoy. (125) It (went) from some place, let's say Amediya to 'Ɛn-Nune. It was all mountains. They would take, for example, fifty kilos or more, up to seventy kilos. They put it on the back of the mule and took it up to 'Ɛn-Nune. (This was) food, that is a 'ration' of such things. We called it 'ration'.

(126) What is a ration? The ration consisted of wheat. There was also sugar and flour, which would come by commissioned (pack-animals). They brought it up to the village (in this way). Their livelihood was in the mule. A mule was very strong. Everybody who had a mule lived by it. We looked after a mule very well, we took care of it. (127) A mule had a 'cloth'. What was a cloth made from? It was made from (a thick fabric) that we called čuxa. We called it a 'cloth'. The cloth had its 'back end'. This consisted of a belt. They would place things, various items on its back, and would tie them with a strap. (They also attached a belt known as) 'the front end', so that when they went up into the mountains, the cloth would not move and the load fall off. (128) When they loaded it, there was a rope. The rope had a buckle.[40] With this rope they would tie up the load. When the mule was (loaded like this), they took the load from place to place. When the mules were at home, we would go and graze them. What is grazing? In the morning we would take them to the farmland. (129) We would hold them with our hands, for, once we had let a mule's head go, we could not catch it again and it would run away. We would let it eat where there was a good place (for feeding), so that it would become strong, so that it would become tough, so that it could travel in the convoy and return (safely).

(130) I remember, when I was young, I think I was ten, or thereabouts, in the year 1946. It was in the month of July, on a Sunday. On a Sunday people did not work. I had gone down to the farmland, I together with my sister. She was in charge of sheep and I was in charge of a mule. The mule was in my hand, barebacked. I had a bit of a cold. I was sitting on its bare back, that is it was without a cloth. I was sitting on its back. Indeed, I was never afraid (to do so). (131) On that day I was grazing it. I was grazing it in a certain piece of land. There was a boundary area (and this is where) I grazed it. Now, I was sitting (on the ground) while it was on this boundary area. The boundary area there is between one plot of land and another. It was narrow, not very wide. It put its mouth in the rice. We had sown rice. I said, I shouted at it like this. It turned itself round. I thought it would not strike me. It turned itself round. Its back legs (gave) a kick, it gave me a kick.

(132) With one of its legs it kicked me here, on my head, and threw me into the paddy field. I shouted and my sister came. My head was injured around here. I got up and bound up my head, my sister bound my head. The mule came to me. I sat on its back and went up to the house. We became friends again. A mule is very tame. It is safe, very tame. We used to look after it and our livelihood depended to some extent on it. Whoever had a mule had a good livelihood.

(133) With a mule we would transport wood. We would transport wood from the mountains for winter. That is whenever it was convenient and the mule was not going on a convoy, they would go to the mountains and fetch dry wood. As far as we could (we fetched) dry wood. It was the job of the whole village to transport and bring things from the land to the home. (134) This was on the back of a mule, since (things) were far away and they could not do this otherwise, namely the transportation of rice, the transportation of wheat, of manure. What is manure? It is the muck of animals. We took it out of the stable basement, before people sowed the rice. We would take it down to the land and spread it there, and also (spread it) there after they had bound up the rice. (135) During the first week they would put it in the paddy field in order for the rice to grow well. How did they take the manure down? (In) what we call a 'pannier basket'. What is a pannier basket? It consists only of pliable sticks from the farmland, which we cut down. There were many people who made what we called a pannier basket. There were people whose job this was, you see, so that they would gain a little (extra income). (136) They would make the pannier baskets and bring them (for people to buy). Then they would tie together the baskets in pairs[41] with rope. They would tie them together with rope and when they transported manure they would put them on the back of a mule. They would put them on the back of the mule empty. It would stand by the door of the stable basement, (after) they had brought the manure outside. They would lift the muck from the ground with a threshing fork and put it in the pannier basket. (137) They would fill the pannier basket on both sides. They brought them (the baskets) down to the plots of land, the farmland. You see, their farmland was far off. After they went down to the farmland, the emptying of the manure was easy. You would push from one side to the other so that the baskets would turn round and so empty the manure, then put them again on the back of the mule.

(138) We would sit on the back of the mule on top of those baskets, in between them. We would come and fetch the manure, every day we would transport the manure in this way. They used the manure for rice. Now they use it for apples. Manure is a vital feature of the entire farm, you see. The whole farm must spread this.

Sheep's Tail

(139) In the village they would make other things. We looked after sheep in the summer for the fat tail. We would look after sheep so that they became fat, in order to slaughter them in the autumn. We would slaughter them in September, October and November in order to dry the fat tail.[42] We cut it into pieces, then cooked it and put it into tin. We would keep it (in storage) to set for the winter, in order to eat it.

Instruments Used for Harvesting

(140) In summer we would go trimming. What is trimming? We would go to the poplar trees that we have there (in our village), which are (a type of) willow. There was a chopper. The chopper was made of iron. The chopper was made of iron. We would climb up a poplar tree and cut down a branch that was small, one that was not very big. We would bring it back and in the evening would put it (on the ground). (141) Sheep would come and we would put it down in front of them for them to eat, so that they would become fat. We called this job trimming. As for the harvesting of grass, there was a sickle. We had people there, there was a village near to us (called) Dɛrəške, this was their job, they used to make sickles. This was (for) the harvesting of wheat and grass. The chopper was for chopping wood and the like. (142) At that time there was what we called an axe. The axe was for chopping thick pieces of wood. The axe was also made by those craftsmen, blacksmith, as we called them. A certain Šlemun from Dɛrəške (used to make them). These people from Dɛrəške, as we called them, were our neighbours. They would make axes, they would make choppers and they would make sickles.

(143) There was grass called meadows. There were many of these meadows.[43] They would make a sickle, but it was not called a sickle, it was called a scythe. The scythe was big. Not all people at that time could work (with it), it needed great skill, for there were many of these meadows and they were not (like) those (types of land) that we harvested with a sickle. (144) A sickle was for (working) in rice (plantations), grass and the like. We would cut down with it a little at a time. But the scythe is made of iron, such scythes are something big, you see, for those large meadows. Since these meadows require two or three men, in a whole day they can barely manage to harvest a very small amount.

Roofs of Houses

(145) In our community it started raining from October, November onwards. What was there (to protect us)? We had roofs. A roof was of earth, mud. We called this sərsərra (gravel mixed with mud). It was strong. On the roof, when it rained, we had a roller. What is a roller? It is a stone, bored with a hole in its side, on one side and the other side. We brought and fashioned a piece of wood and with that piece of wood we would move it to and fro.[44] (146) We call that 'compressing' (mandore), in that we rolled the roof and the roof became compressed, so that leaking drops did not seep through in the winter. If it rained a little, they put down a little straw, so that it became more compact. In the old days it snowed a lot. Now it does not snow (so much). The climate has changed.

Hunting Partridges

(147) In the old days (when) it snowed a lot, we used to go hunting partridges. What is partridge hunting? Partridge hunting is in February or March, (when) there is a lot of snow. (They are called) partridges. The partridge lives in the mountains. In summer we could not catch them, but rather people would kill them. However, in winter, when there was snow, they could not walk (and we used to catch them). They used to come, we knew that they would come in the evening.

(148) 'ɛn-Nune lies between one mountain and another. 'ɛn-Nune lies between one mountain and another alongside a river. It is a very pleasant place. The (mountain known as) ba-roža[45] is sunny, which lies opposite (the mountain known as) ṭalana[46] on the other side. On the right was ṭalana and on the left ba-roža. Partridges would come. (When) a flock of partridges came, this was in the winter, (there was) snow and we could not move about (easily). We would go off (hunting). (149) When it had moved a kilometre from one place to another, let's say, when it sat down it could not fly, and we would go and catch it easily, because it was so tired, you see. We call this 'partridge hunting'. There is something else that is called a 'trap'. A trap is made of iron. They would set it up and catch (animals). They would catch rabbits. The would catch foxes with it, mountain animals.

Celebrations at the End of February

(150) What other things shall I tell you? (There were) various customs. At that time there was a fast of šaweta.[47] We would go around the houses. The houses in our community were seventy or eighty in number.[48] We would begin the fast. When we began fasting, we would predict on the day of Mar Sawa[49] that the day would be fine, cloudy, snowy. We would say to each person, if he was a good man, that on that day the sun will shine.[50] (151) We were having fun. It was like that on that day, we would just say such things. They were all good people, we are not saying they were not. But at that time, it was a ritual for us to say this if the sun was fine. If there was no sun (we said that) the man is not good. On the day (the festival) finished, the last day (was the last day of the month that) we called February. (152) (The month of) February was very bad in our land. There was a lot of snow, a lot of rain and so on. When February was finished—it is twenty-eight or twenty-nine days long—we would go to the mountains. There is something called 'juniper'. It is a tree, called 'juniper'. We used to go—we were young school children at that time—and fetch the juniper and make a big pile of it.

(153) We gathered together a lot of snow and piled (the juniper over it). We would 'burn February'. We would say that it was a bad thing. We would set fire to it. We called this məlmәlawa. We would say 'Good riddance February [51] (The month of) March has come.' That is to say (the month) we call March is pleasant and February has gone. This was a symbolic act of our country at that time.

(154) When this was finished, we took a stone and put it in the fire. (When) it had heated up a little, we threw it far away (from the fire) and people would say 'Go and fetch it!' Whoever was the quickest and reached it first would bring it back. Since there was snow and it was warm, the snow melted and it dropped down into the snow. To whoever brought it back they would say 'Bravo! He is the winner!'[52] (155) The young boys would say such things. They would say this: 'Good riddance February. March has come.' They would do this every year in the month of February, since the Winter was very severe. After we had finished, we would go around the houses, everyone with a small vessel in his hand. People would give each one boiled wheat, all kinds of things, chickpeas, white beans, various things, all of which the people had prepared. They put these in the vessels and everyone returns home.

(156) For the beginning of the fast (of Lent) some of us made a ṣawm-әkka. What is a ṣawmәkka? They would dress it in clothes, they would dress it in leather, then it would go off and we would go around the houses (with it). We would collect (from people) various things, such as apples and what was called kәčkaje (dried fruits). Some people gave money. (157) This was called a ṣawmәkka for the beginning of the fast (ṣawma), since the fast began at that time. This also was a custom that the people had at that time. It was very nice. Five or six people went around and took a drum with them, and went around in the snow. They did many things. They would do these things for February.

Sheep and Goats

(158) We in the villages had small cattle, white small cattle ('sheep') and black small cattle ('goats'). In summer they would hire a shepherd and pay him (for his services). Every day somebody went up (the mountains) with him called a 'assistant'. He (the shepherd) would go up in the morning (and work) until evening. The small cattle would remain in the mountains.

(159) In the summer they would come during the day, they would go up and people would graze them, then they would come back to the resting place. When they came to the resting place near the village, milkmaids would come up, women, each would carry her pail and go to the resting place and they would milk the small cattle. After they milked the small cattle, they left them to rest. (160) They remained (there until the sun) set and the heat was broken, as we say. They would go up and graze until evening. In the evening they would bring them to a place closer (to the village) where there was water. Again they would go and milk the small cattle. They would return and remain during the night in the mountains. (161) Now, in the 1940s,[53] thieves, brigands as we call them, came (to steal) the small cattle that remained in the mountains. The thieves who came were five or six in number. They came in the night and seized the shepherd and his assistant. They tied their hands, stole the small cattle and took them over the border, that is (the border of) the country on our side. (162) There was a cry of alarm in the village. In those days there were rifles, weapons, as we called them, rifles. There was an cry of alarm. I remember all the people got up and went up (into the mountains) to (investigate) the alarm, they went up (into the mountains) at the cry of alarm, but the small cattle had been smuggled to another country, that is to Turkey. (163) They battled for a day or two, then our people robbed some of the small cattle of the Kurds on the other side and brought them back. Such things were always happening. Many times such things happened. People would come and steal them (i.e. our sheep).

Yoghurt and Cheese

(164) Now, they brought back home the milk that they milked. They brought it home, strained it and put it in a pan. Then they boiled it, that is they heated it up and boiled it in order to make it into yoghurt. After the milked boiled, they put it aside until it cooled slightly. Before it became very cool—there were some who put a finger in it and if the finger tolerated (the heat), it meant that it was time to add the rennet.

(165) They used to make rennet from many things. They would add it and cover it after a certain time. Then they would put it in some place until it set. The next day they would get up and see that it had become yoghurt. The yoghurt, (made from) the milk, would set (with) a crust. Its crust was delicious. They would serve it to people for them to eat at breakfast and so on and to the young children in the house. They would eat the yoghurt. (166) As for what was left over—of course there was a lot, people had many small cattle. What did they do? From the milk and the yoghurt they made cheese. They would heat it (the milk) then bring a bag for the yoghurt, in which they put it. After they put it in it they tied it up. They put a flattish stone under it and put a stone on top of it, in order to squeeze out whatever water it had in it, so that it would flow down. (167) It took one or two days until it became dry. After it dried they hung it for a while. They would then bring the cheese and lay it out (to be eaten). Some people liked to put herbs in it. There was a cheese that they made with herbs. Some put the herb sɨrmo into it and dill, and many different ones. For when was all this cheese (made)? For winter. Since in winter there were not many dairy products, so they kept them. (168) What did they do? After the cheese became abundant, they put it in storage jars. These jars were made from clay. There were some people in the country whose job was (to do) this. They made jars, large pots and small pots, in which water was transported, all kinds of things. They would put cheese in these vessels. (169) They compressed it. Everybody in his home would dig (a hole) and over the surface of the cheese they would put leaves, vine leaves, so that dirt would not get into it. They would tie up its mouth and place it upside down (in the ground). (170) I remember, when we were young, I used to go down with my brother and he placed (the cheese in the ground). We would dig (a hole) and he would place it upside down and cover it. We knew where it was. We knew where each of the neighbours had put (their jars). (171) (This was) until the season of Autumn, when we each began to take it (out of the ground). People would use it until the beginning of winter. They would make cheese in this way. (This is) how they made it out of milk and how in the end cheese was produced and people used it for their household.

Cows

(172) There were cows. They served only to provide their food. They would milk the cow. There was a herd of cattle, as we said, for in the summer they would put all (their cows in the herd) and they would go up into the mountains. They would hire somebody called a cow-herd. He would graze the cows and the oxen. They call him a cow-herd. Early in the morning they would milk the cow and it would go up to the herd. (173) They would heat its milk, in the same way (as described). They would set it by putting rennet into it, just as they made (sheep's) milk. The preparation of the milk is the same. They heat it and it is left (to cool). Afterwards they put rennet into it and take it away (to leave it to set). But the yoghurt of sheep is much better and more choice than that of cattle. (174) In the Autumn and the Spring the sheep would give birth. How do sheep reproduce? They give birth, producing lambs. The goats would give birth to young females and males. From year to year they would increase, the small cattle of people would increase. (175) The method of milking all (animals) is the same. A woman would go and place a pail on her knees and would squeeze it, that is, she would milk the cow. They know how to milk the cow. The cow is domesticated. They put down grass (for it). If it has a small calf, before she milks it, she allows it to give suck (to the calf) a little, then she milks it and leaves a little more for the calf. This is because it is small and had not yet started to eat grass. (They allowed it to have milk) to be good (in health) and progress (in growth).

Bees

(176) Some people in the village used to keep bees for honey. They would keep them in springtime. They would put them in a beehive. The bees—there were many flowers, in the Spring all kinds of flowers came out—(the bees) would go to fetch their food (from the flowers) until their season arrived in Autumn. In Autumn, there are skilled people,[54] as they are called. There was a way to do it. It becomes something called a honeycomb. (177) After it becomes a honeycomb—this took four or five months—after it becomes a honeycomb, they say it is time, for the weather must be somewhat cool. In October or November the weather is cool. This was so that the bees did not start to fly away.

(178) They (the beekeepers) would take hold of the honeycomb. They would hold the hive whilst wearing a cloth so that the bees would not sting them. They put it into a vessel and took it way slowly. Afterwards they would put it into small jugs. They would prepare honey in this way. Many people had honey for themselves. Some of them sold it, though most people used it for their household, for their family.

Houses

(179) In the old days houses were built with stone and mud. In the old days, seventy or eighty years ago, they would build like that. But from the forties onwards, after people had money—since the people worked—they began to build their houses with stone and gypsum plaster. They would bring the stone from the mountains. They would go to the mountains—the stone was hidden, so they planted gunpowder. (180) There were builders, labourers we called them, labourers. They would go and blow them up and extract the white stones. They cut these white stones, making them very small. They were only in the mountains. (They were brought) from there. They (made) the stone that we call the 'facing' (of the house).[55] It is the stone of the facing. They would carve it out. It was white, beautifully clean. (181) Mules would go and transport it. Each mule would carry a load of four stones, since they were heavy. They transported them in containers. The containers were made of wood. These containers were on the back of mules, tied to the back of pack animals, which we called a mule. (182) They would put two stones on this side and two on the other side and bring them to the village. They would pay the man's (i.e. the labourer's) money, they would pay him however much it cost. After they brought it (to the village), they would prepare everything. Before they began building, they went and set up a furnace to make gypsum, so that they could start building. (183) What is a furnace? They would go—this also was in the mountains. They would dig and put wood around it and build it up into a certain shape. They would bring stones and wood. Then under it they would put fire. The gypsum stones would burn. After it burnt, they all became like flour. We call the gypsum flour.

(184) After it burnt and they considered that it was enough for building, they would proceed to transport it in sacks, since it had become like flour, it was ground. They put the gypsum in sacks and brought it to the village, wherever[56] your house that you were building was situated. Then they would begin to build. (185) Inside the house was stone and mud, but behind this was its (outer) facing. Its facing consisted of the stones that I said were clean, nicely cut and carved, as they say. Together with these (stones) they would put gypsum. The gypsum was very strong. After about ten days, you would say that it stuck together, you would say that the gypsum all stuck together in a single stone. (186) They would build in this way. This is the wall, which they built in the this way. Then, of course, (they would make) the doors, which were made of wood there. (They would make) the 'finishing' (at the top of the wall), as we call it, that is (the base of the) the roof. First of all, there were poplar trees. These poplar were thick. They laid these poplar (to make the roof). They had built the rooms (by this stage). (187) There were, for example, six rooms in a house, five rooms. They were all built within (the house). They would build these with ordinary stone, not with white stone. After that they would bring poplar (trunks). People would transport them. They would float down the river after people cut them up. (After) they dried a little, they would remove their bark. (188) Volunteer workers, as they are called, would transport them and help one another (in the task). Those strong men would transport them. At that time there were many people in the village. They would bring them, take them up (to the village) and then place them on top of the wall. They placed them on top of the wall and after that, on top of the wall, they would bring (and fit) slats. (189) These were also cut (to measure) and were made of wood, (placed) between one beam and another. Each (space) between one beam and another was, perhaps, about metre and a half (long). This was because (the space) must not be wider. If it were to become wider, (the roof) would collapse, as we say, that is it would come down, when it was winter and the snow arrived. (190) In proportion as the poplars were narrowly spaced and thick, they survived longer. After they laid the slats, they would bring leaves. They would have previously collected the leaves. They would place the leaves on this, (using only) those that were selected (for good quality). Afterwards they laid a light layer of sand and a little mud, or the like, so that it would all adhere together.

(191) Then they would put soil on it. After they put soil on it—they knew how much to put on, so that it was not too much and spoil. Furthermore, there was a special soil (which had to be used), that is not any type of soil. It was different. They laid the last (section of the roof) they laid also what was round it, around the wall, which we called 'eaves'. The eaves protruded from the wall, so that the water would not run down the wall. These also were dealt with. (192) At that time, the last thing (they did for) the roof was that they brought what is called 'white gravel'. This is also a kind of soil, rather like gravel. They would bring this also on mules. Next to the village there is what is called a quarry (from where they brought it). This is a special stone that they put on the wall. It is very strong. Water does not seep through it, since it retains (water) well. (193) After they do all this, there is what we call a roller. A roller is a stone, which is large and is made specially for this thing. This is called a roller, i.e. it rolls the roof, it compresses it, it compresses the roof. At that time there was a thing called a roller. They would put a piece of wood into it. The ends[57] of the roller are bored, with holes in them, dug out, carved out, as we say. (194) They insert it (the wood) from both sides and pull it with the (handle of) wood that is attached to it, back and forth, rolling the roof. They roll the roof so that it becomes tough, so that when the rain comes and the snow comes, leaking water does not seep down (into the house). In the winter, when it rains, they would roll it in this way. (195) But when it snowed—of course there was a lot of snow—what did they do? We had a snow shovel. They would shovel it—they call it shovelling, that is they would throw it all from the roof from around the eaves, on the right and on the left, whatever place was easiest, since there was a lot of snow. (196) The snow shovel was made of wood. It has a long hand. They would bring a branch of wood from a tree and make it into flat pieces and construct it (the shovel). With this they would shovel the roof, that is they would push off the snow, so that it did not remain on the roof. Sometimes (they did this) many times, two times, three times, at night when it snowed, mainly in December and January. (197) (The month of) February is also bad, that is the snow was heavy. Then it is Spring and from then onwards it is the roller (that they use). That is, from then onwards they have no difficulty with it (the weather). They would build houses in this way. This was the method of building of houses, until recent years, when they began to build them with cement, after people became few (in number) and roads for cars came up (to the village).

(198) They began to bring up cement. Formerly, however, houses were made of mud. They (the houses) became villas, as we called them. We did not call them houses, we called them villas. Since (people) were more prosperous, (they built bigger houses) and they changed the name of them. A house was made of mud, we would call this a house or a small hut. But the other sort was (called) a villa, which was built of stones. This is the way they built houses.

(199) So, I have said how they built houses, but what (furniture) was there in the houses? At that time, indeed, it was not like today. At that time in a house there was one room or two. One room was furnished. There was a mat, as we called it. They brought the mats from the towns at that time. They put these on the floor.[58] (200) Of course at that time there were no armchairs and things like that. Each house had one room, or two or three, but no more than that. All the family lived together, small children, family, all were together. At that time, even if people were married, they all lived together. (201) The floor of the house was furnished with what is called mats. The mats were woven from reeds. They were woven from reeds and similar things. They would put these on the floor. On top they would put rugs, as we called them, rugs, and some people had carpets, which are a bit thicker than rugs. These things are what were called at that time a prista ('a spread'). (202) So, they put these things on (the floor) and around them they laid thin cushions. They laid around (the floor) also pillows. People would sit down at that time. For when they came to a seated gathering, they would take off their shoes then sit down, neighbours, people (of all kinds), relatives, any strangers who may be there,[59] friends. These are the things that were in the house. (203) There were also beds there. These beds were one (type). These beds, which people had, were made of wood.[60] There were carpenters. Carpenters came from Amedia. In the summer they would come and each one would make a bed. If anybody wanted one, they would come. I remember they would come (and sit) under the smooth[61] mulberry tree, the big tree belonging to the church.

(204) Carpenters would come from Amedia and make beds, as we called them. In the summer they took the beds up to the roof. People at that time had to go up onto the roof to sleep, since it was hot in the house. It was more comfortable up above. They would take the beds up to the roof. Some would sleep only on the floor (of the roof). Most people, however, had a bed. (205) Why? So that they could attach a mosquito net. A mosquito net is a curtain. (This was necessary) since there were mosquitoes. At that time people cultivated rice and (since there) was water in the farmland there were many mosquitoes. So, they used a mosquito net. They put these (beds) on the roof until August or September, or thereabouts, before the weather got cold. Then they would gradually begin to come down into the house (to sleep). As far as I remember, there were only these things in their homes, not more.

Flora

(206) There, in the village, in ʾɛn-Nune, we had (what is called) a xelapa (small willow). We cannot use the small willow for the building of houses, since its wood is not strong. But we needed it for many things. We cut it down in large quantities at the time of trimming for small cattle, when it had its leaves. We would cut down its branches and fatten our small cattle. Before the Autumn and Spring seasons we would lay them down for the small cattle (to eat).

(207) We had (in the village) the (tree known as) xorta (white poplar). The poplar is a very fine (tree). We could even sell some of them. After they had grown up and become one, two or three spans thick, buyers would come from Mosul. They also sold them in other places. They were very expensive. We would always cut down their branches. (208) In Spring we would cut them down and strip them off. We would plant them again (and they would become) what we call saplings, so that when these also grow after a few years, they can sell them, so that when they cut (the others down) these will take their place. They call these poplars.

(209) We had apples there. Apples were for buying, that is they would sell them to people. There were peaches. They would sell also these to people. Yet most of these were for household (use). There were almonds. From these almonds they would make jams. They would make jams also from peaches. We had almonds and we had grape vines. (There was what) we called an orchard. This was something very large, which was cultivated, it was called an orchard.

(210) In the orchard there were vines, apricots and other plants. In the season of Autumn, they would gather the grapes and make a syrup from them and make raisins from them. After they made them into raisins, they would make wine. They would (also) make arak out of them. They would make many things out of them. They also left the raisins for eating, since they were very nutritious.[62]

(211) As for wine, they would put raisins into what we call line (jars). (This type of) jar is very big. They go up to the capacity of two gallons, three gallons of water, four. They would put the raisins into these and deposit them in a warm place, which we call a goma (basement stable). They would cover the jar while it was warm. It had to be in the warmth for about forty days in order for it to ferment. They know how to make it. (212) I remember I used to go down (into the basement) with my late brother. I would go down when it was fermenting. (He would say) 'Look, it is fermenting, its time has come.' They would stir it. Every few days they would stir it. This would take about forty days or so. (It would become) wine. They would put the wine into small pots and strain it, and it would turn into wine. (213) In general in our community they did not make much, only rarely. Most people, however, would make arak, arak for drinking, since (it provided) enjoyment. They would make arak for the Autumn, since (at that time) the weddings began, people would marry in the Autumn. (214) They would use it as a drink (to offer) to relatives and other people, (when) neighbours came, friends came, guests came. They used it as a drink also for a festival, the festivals. Arak was a very special drink (that was used to express) love and respect for people when they visited one another.

(215) We also had walnuts. Walnuts were very big. Not everybody had them in the village, where they did not grow much. We had some walnut trees, which mainly belonged to the church. Each was for use by (the villagers) themselves, since there was scarcely enough for household use (and none to spare). These (grew) from Spring until the Autumn. (216) In the Autumn they would go and pick them. After picking them, they would bring them to the house and lay them down to dry, as we say. They would (be left to) dry, since they have a peel on them which is dark in colour. If it is still wet, as soon as your hand touches it, the hand of the person (who touches it) becomes black, it is dyed, as we say, dyed, you see. (This is because) the peel is so strong (in colour).

(217) After it dried, however, they would take away the peel and throw it away, so that only the nuts would remain. On the occasion of festivals, saints' days and weddings they would use them for many things. (They would use them) for example for confetti (scattered over the head of a bride), for cakes made for a festival, all (kinds of) things were made out of these walnuts.

(218) We have quinces. Quinces. There were not so many of these in the village. Also these were for household use. It is also a fruit, that is they are just like apples. (They grow) from Spring until Autumn. In Autumn they become yellow. In fact they were green, then in the end they became yellow. (219) People go to pick them and use them in the home. If you want to make jam—they make jam also from these, that is from quinces. You can make make many (other) things from them, if they are left over. You can use them. Why should one buy anything if one can use them? For they had many of them.

(220) In the mountains there was a tree which we called…there were terebinth trees. There was the terebinth. This was a very large (tree). These also had their season. These were mostly in the mountains. They were not close to the village, they were far away. In the Autumn, when (their nuts) become ripe, (they have) what are called bunches (of fruit). People go to pick them. (221) They were very tasty and fine (to eat). Many of the local people used to sell them, since they were expensive (to buy) and they were fine (to eat). (They kept) some of them for themselves, for when guests came to them. They were very fine (to eat), very nice. There were terebinth nuts.

(222) In the mountains there were wild pears, as we call them, pears, un-irrigated, as we say, in the mountains. When people go to fetch wood, they would bring back also these for use in the home. Plums, we have plums. These were only in the farmland. These were also very tasty. They were red and yellow, (they were) delicious. People would make jam from them to eat. We have many fruits.

(223) With regard to flowers, those that grow there include what are called kəskənne and balazeze. There are bukine ('red anemones'). There are red flowers, which are very beautiful. These, indeed, (come out) in Spring. For animal fodder we have what is called rasa. This rasa is for sheep. It grows in April and May and is (found) in the mountains. (224) It is near the village in the mountains, not in the farmland. They use this rasa for small cattle, mainly sheep. We have flowers called žeri flowers. These are (found) in the farmland. There are many varieties. There were red ones and those that are green. These are the flowers.

Swimming

(225) In summer, as I remember, in summertime, there was a river, as we call it, a river. When it is warm, people go and build a pool. The pool becomes deep. People come to bathe in it. Early in the morning we would go to look after the cattle and then return. At eleven or twelve o'clock we would go to the pool to have fun, playing and swimming, until three, four or five o'clock. (226) Then we would (go off) again to look after the lambs and the cattle, since they did not put the lambs, (cattle) and mules in the mountains. People would go to graze them, then they took hold of them, took them to be fed and brought them back in the evening.

Outings

(227) We in 'ɛn-Nune used to go down to Bəšmiyaye, we used to go down to Sardašte. These are all villages. They are all what is called the Barwar. We used to go down to the Zab for outings,[63] as we would say. People would come. They would come up from the villages. We would go on outings and catch fish there. (228) There was always somewhere where there was a saint's day festival and we would go from village to village. We did such things out of respect for each other. If there was a saint's day festival in Dure, everybody on that day would go to Dure. The saint's day festival of Dure is on the first Sunday after Easter. It is called the new Sunday. (229) There is (also the village of) Maye, that is the saint's day festival of Maye. They used to come to 'ɛn-Nune. The saint's day festival of 'ɛn-Nune was in September. On the twenty-fourth of September everybody gathers. (Those) in the towns and in other regions come up and so forth. We did all these things to show respect for one another. (230) (When) there was a saint's day festival, it was the festival of everybody. People would go to the village. There was a church in the village and they would hold communion. After communion, they would come out and eat, make merry, sing and dance. They would bring wine, they would bring arak, everything. (This was) in the old days, when the world was more pleasant. (231) They would bring the drum and pipe. People would sing and dance. It was very very nice. We would go around the villages. We went round all of them. In the Summer and the Winter there was a mutual coming and going, since people had a family relationship among one another. What is a family relationship?

(232) The meaning of family relationship is (as follows). If you have given somebody of your family or a daughter of yours to a certain village (in marriage), (the two families) become relatives. If a relative of yours, a person of your family or somebody married (into your family) comes to you, they call these people family relatives. (233) These things happened, that is (marriages) between one village and another, for example a girl marries (in this way), either a man goes and brings (a wife) from another village or a girl from here goes to another village. These things (happened) and they call this a family relationship. We used to say that this (was necessary) so that humanity did not disappear. Humanity should not disappear but should be renewed. (234) When we went from one village to another, we used to think that we were in our own village. We always saw each other and enjoyed ourselves. People sat (in each other's homes out of) respect and stayed to sleep in order to (participate in) a wedding. They would stay one or two nights. There was a lot of coming and going among the villages, with lots of meetings.[64] There was friendship, humanity, family relationship, everything.

Festivals

(1) Let's begin with the Great Festival. The festivals of the Assyrian Christians that took place in Barwar. The Great Festival is a ceremony (commemorating) the resurrection of Christ after he had been killed. On the third day he rose from the tomb, and every Christian in the whole world holds a festival. (2) We would hold the festival for three days. In some places the festival was for one day. People would fast for fifty days, (in) a fast, which we called the Great Fast. After fifty days, the day of the festival occurred, which would always fall on a Sunday. This is the Great Festival.

(3) The second day of the festival was called geyasa ('the (good) thief'). The geyasa was the second day of the festival. The people would go and take communion. The priest would take a long stick. He would take it in his hand and make a sign like this on the heads of the people, he would tap it on the heads of the people, as blessings. (4) We call these 'blessings'. They would scatter confectionery on their heads. The confectionery consisted of sweets, walnuts, dates. They would throw them like this on the heads of the people. It was a ceremonial act, so that every family would have blessings, so that they would have abundant blessings in their food and sustenance. The geyasa ceremony is this.

(5) After the Great Festival, forty days after the Great Festival, the festival of Ascension occurs. Ascension means that Christ ascended to Heaven on that day, on the fortieth day after the Great Festival. After he rose from the tomb, (after) he had been killed, he ascended to Heaven. (6) On that day the people hold a party, they take communion and perform a memorial service. Then all the people go and swing. (7) What is swinging? They hang a rope on a tree that is large and very high, on a branch, and the people sit on the rope—they make a place to sit. One person pushes them and they go back and forth in the air—this is called swinging. Its meaning is that Christ ascended to Heaven and also they are flying back and forth in the air, in a symbolic act (commemorating) the going up of Christ to Heaven. This is the (festival of) Ascension.

(8) Afterwards another small festival occurs, which is called musarde. Musarde falls in Ṭabbax, August. What festival is this? This (commemorates) when Christ came to the river Jordan and Saint John, who was there, baptized him. He put water over Christ and baptized him, then the Holy Spirit descended from Heaven and descended into Christ. We call this baptism. (9) Everybody…when a young child is born, he must be baptized in the church and they put water over him. The priests and deacons bless him and they put water over him, as Saint John had put water on the head of Christ. This (festival) is called musarde. (10) All the people go out and sprinkle water on each other. What is (the significance of) scattering water over each other? So many people came around Christ, so many, that Saint John could not put a scoop of water over everybody. (11) So he scattered water over them like this, so that the water would reach all of them. In this way we perform (the festival of) musarde on that day. In the morning the people all scatter water over each other, and this is what we do until the evening.

(12) Then we have (another) festival, the festival of Christmas. The festival of Christmas is (in commemoration of) the birth of Christ, that is the fact that Christ was born. He was born on the twenty-fifth of December. For twenty-five days before (the day of) his birth, people fast for twenty five days. Christian people fast for twenty-five days. (13) The twenty-fifth day is the festival. They hold celebrations, people go to church, they take communion then come out. Afterwards, all of us in the villages gathered together, either with a priest with us or a head of the village, and we went around (offering) festival blessings. (14) First we would go and offer a festival blessing to the priest. We would offer him a festival blessing. Then we would go to the house of the village head and would offer also him a festival blessing. We would then visit the whole village in a row, going around the village. We would offer festival blessings to all the people of the village. (15) We would go into one house after another and offer festival blessings, then come out. When we went into a house, people would drink arak, they would bring snacks, food, fruit, sweets, cigarettes. Each time we would sit for a quarter of an hour, half an hour, sometimes even an hour. (16) Sometimes the owner of the house would cook food when it was time for food. The people would eat and go out, then go to another house, until all the village was finished. This is the Small Festival. We called it the Small Festival. It was the festival of the birth of Christ. These are our festivals.

(17) There was 'The Rogation of the Ninevites'. The Rogation of the Ninevites is not a religious festival. It is a national festival. Once Nineveh was the capital of the Assyrians. At that time there was a flood of water. The water increased. When the water increased, the whole town became filled with water, the water began to rise and people drowned. (18) People began to drown—some people, some saved themselves. Some went up onto the roofs of houses. Some went up onto high places so that the water would not reach them. (19) The king gave an order saying 'Everybody should fast. (Everybody) should fast and should not eat anything for three days. (Everybody) should not drink water or eat food for three days and they should ask God to stop this flood, to stop this increase in water'. (20) Then, after three days, the water began to diminish and go down. After three days the water went down and diminished, the flood finished. They call it (in surəθ) ṭawpana ('flood'), ṭawpana means 'increase in water'. This is a festival. (21) Our people fast for three days—some people, some do not fast. Some fast for three days and after three days they go and take communion, then it is over. It is a small festival and it belongs to the Assyrian nation. This festival is not a Christian one. It is (called) the Rogation of the Ninevites.

(22) Every village that had a church—these villages had a saint's festival, a festival (commemorating) the day that the saint died. On this date they hold a festival. They call the festival šera. Do you know how they perform it? (23) In the morning the people go to church and take communion. They go out at midday, from twelve o'clock to one, everybody, each family, cooks any type of food that they like. (Each) fills a large tray and brings it down and places it in a certain place. (24) There are several (such) places—they are mulberry trees, some places are walnut trees, which are shady, for this festival day always falls at a time when it is summer. (25) During the saint day festivals it is always hot, so people sit in the shade, the shade of trees, mulberry trees, walnut trees. They place all the food in rows in one place. The people of the village or people from outside, if there are any, all come and sit and eat the food. (26) When they finish eating, the people go around the houses. Some people from outside, from other villages, come and enter peoples' houses and offer them festival blessings. They sit and drink tea, bring them food, and they get up and go. This is the festival of 'Ɛn-Nune, which (takes places) there for Saint Sawa, at the church of Saint Sawa.

(27) Saint Sawa was a saint who was of Iranian, Persian, origin. In his time, his father—according to one (version of) of history, it is said that his father was a king. He (Sawa) believed the Christians, believed in the Christian religion. (28) The king was a worshipper of idols. He was king of Iran. They used to worship idols. They did not know God. They did not know what the religion of Christians was. They used to worship idols. (29) His father the king said 'I shall kill my son'. His son fled. He fled from Iran and came and wandered in Ṭiyare. He died there in Ṭiyare. (30) Then, in the place that he died, our Christians, the Assyrians, built a church and buried him there. They buried him in (the site of) that church and built the church over him. They gave it the name of Saint Sawa. (31) When we built our church in 'ɛn-Nune—it is not written[1] when it was built, it is not written on what date it was built, but according to our reckoning of its age, it was built between four-hundred and six-hundred years ago. It is more than four hunrdred years old. Perhaps it is less than six hundred years ago, when it was built there. (32) So, when we built it with the name of Saint Sawa of Ṭiyare, people went up to Ṭiyare and brought back a stone from the church of Saint Sawa in Ṭiyare. They brought it back and placed it in 'ɛn-Nune and built a church over it, over the stone. (33) They said this is (the church of) Saint Sawa. They gave it the name of Saint Sawa after (the church of) Saint Sawa which is in Ṭiyare. In the year (19)88, Ṣaddām gave an order to his soldiers, when they destroyed the village and he destroyed also (the church of) Saint Sawa. (34) They came to destroy it with bulldozers, but they could not destroy it, so solid where its walls. They put dynamite in it, dynamite, and blew it up, and also many (other) churches in Barwar. Every village that was destroyed and had a church in it, they destroyed all the churches (in them).

Baptism

(35) When a Christian baby is born—anybody who has a son, after a few months, before he reaches a year, when he is around six months, three months, before he reaches a year in age, they take him to the church. (36) The priest and the deacon pray over him and his family and they put water on his head. They put some oil on his forehead and make for him a sign like a cross. They call this the sign of the suffering ones. This is baptism. Its meaning is that this baby has become a Christian. It has been baptized with a Christian baptism.

(37) Čita is the butter of sheep. They boil the milk of animals, of sheep or cows, and let its heat become about forty degrees. They put rennet in it. They keep it. They put a cloth over it so that it remains warm, for eight hours. The milk then becomes yoghurt. (38) They put the yoghurt in a churn. What is a churn? It is an animal skin. They strip (it off the animal). We call it a 'churn'. They put it (the yoghurt) in it and churn it. They tie it with a rope and hang it onto a piece of wood or onto the beam of a house and churn it. (39) What is churning? This means moving it. Moving back and forth quickly. They put water into it. For quarter of an hour, ten minutes, half an hour, they shake it and shake it until the yoghurt becomes like water. (40) They gather together the butter of the yoghurt. They gather it together and take it out. The butter remains behind[2] and they put the dawwe (yoghurt water) in a large pot. We call this butter čita. (41) They use it—either they eat it on bread or the put it in rice or, when they cook rice, they put it in stew and make it into gərðo, what is called gərðo. This is čita. As for the dawwe, the water of the yoghurt that remains is called dawwe. (42) Qaška is (made by) boiling the dawwe. They boil it and put it aside. The water comes to the top. They pour off the water that comes to the top. What remains they put in a bag, a white bag of muslin, and hang it on a peg until all its water drains away. (43) It becomes like paste, it becomes like dough. This is xalwa, we call it xalwa. It is the xalwa of dawwe. They make it round and put it in the sun and it dries. When it dries they call it qaška. (44) This qaška—in winter, when people need dawwe to cook stew, they put it again in water and dissolve it, they dissolve it in water and it becomes something like dawwe. They put rice in it and cook it. It becomes stew. (It is) instead of dawwe. This is qaška.

Bread

(45) Ṭəlme: When they knead flour into a dough and it rises, they put yeast in it and it rises, they bring a griddle. The griddle is made of iron. We could say that it is like a tray, but bigger. They put it on stones and make a fire under it. The griddle becomes hot.

(46) They take the dough and put it on a wide stone, on a wide table like this. They push a round stick of wood on it, moving back and forth, until it becomes thin. The dough becomes very thin. (47) They take it with a rolling pin, that is a stick of wood, and put it on the hot griddle with fire under it and it cooks. It cooks, they turn it on one side and on the other, until it cooks. They call this ṭəlme, ṭləmθa (sing.).

(48) Lawaše is just like a ṭləmθa, but they put in the oven. The oven is hot. After they put fire in it, it heats up a lot. They take the ṭlemθa and place it in the oven. It cooks and it is called lawaše. It is the same as a ṭləmθa, if you put it on a griddle and cook it, it becomes a ṭləmθa, if you put it in an oven and cook it, it is called lawaše.

(49) A zeðaya is thicker. It is thick. They take the same bread (dough). They do not place it on a griddle, they put it in the oven. It is thicker. It is called zeðaya.

(50) Qəllora: Qəllora is the same bread, but maize, not ordinary wheat, not (made) from such wheat.

(51) Kada: We used to make a kada cake for festivals. They put cake filling in it. They put cake filling in it or walnuts—they break their kernels, grind them, mix them with butter and put them in it. They close them like this so that they do not fall out. They put them in the oven. It cooks like a zeðaya. They cook it in an oven. They call it a kada.

(52) There is another type (of cake called) kuleče. These are small like this. They put (walnut) kernels and oil also in these. They are small like this. They put an egg, which they break—they mix the yolk of an egg, they put it like this on the kuleče cakes, so that their colour will be more red, more yellow, and so that they will be more tasty. They make these for a festival.

The Regulator of a Water-Mill (čakčaka)

(53) A mill operates by water. What is its power, which turns it? It is water. The water drives round a propeller. This consists of long blades. The water drives them round and it turns. They are tied to a pole. On the top of this pole is the mill, a stone, a round stone, which has, of course, a place in which the wheat falls, under that stone. (54) It turns and grinds it and it becomes flour. Here there is the drum. The drum is a box, with an open top, in which they put wheat. Under it there is a small hole through which wheat runs out onto the stone for it to be ground.

(55) There is a small stick, which is a span or more long. Perhaps it is thirty centimetres long. There is a thick (section) on it like this. It is attached to it. When the mill turns—it is like this on top of it—when it turns, it does this, it moves. (56) When it moves, its other end is attached to the drum so that it lets down wheat (in a) controlled (flow), that is so that a lot does not flow down at once. It comes down, little by little. We call this in Arabic mnaḍḍəm ('controller'). (57) I do not know what they call it in surəθ. Let's say 'controller', the controller of how the wheat flows down into the mill in order for it to be ground, so that it all flows down in the way you like, so that a lot does not flow down at once. This is called a čakčaka. This word čakčaka comes from its sound. It makes a sound like čak čak čak čak. So they gave this stick the name čakčăka.

Girls' Sunday

(1) In our land of Barwar, the girls of our village would celebrate 'Girls' Sunday' like a saint's festival. They would make something like a girl out of wood and dress her in clothes. They made her like a girl. Then they went and took from every house rice, they took meat fat, they took bread, from every house in our village. (If) there was snow, they, of course, walked there on the snow. (2) They demonstrated a kind of grief. They made the girl whom they dressed in clothes like a bride and brought her (through the streets). She was wood dressed in clothes, but they made her like a girl. Now, they took her. Three or four men went with them. They went and buried her. (3) They buried her in the ground, as if a girl had died. They would really weep. They would weep for her a lot and then come back. They would come back from the cemetery, from her (burial). They would come back and make food. They would cook rice. They would cook soup. Then they would sit down and eat. (4) After they had eaten, they would get up and play, dance and sing. There were many games that they played. They would play all that day and all the people of the village would go up to look at them. Also adult men would go there, as well as young children, to play, since this day is Girls' Sunday. (5) They would say 'On Girls' Sunday there was (washing) ash in the cooking pots', meaning that they were fasting. It was a season of fasting. The meaning is that they say at that time 'Let's wash, let's wash the pots'. They would say 'Ash on the pots', that is the cooking pots.[1] (6) They would then start to play games. There was a game called baybune (in which they said) 'baybi baybune, marət raqqune' and I don't know what. They would say this. There was the game of 'groups', one person running after the other. There was 'jumping the rams'. They played every type of game. It continued like this until evening. In the evening they returned, everybody went back to his home and they dispersed.

[1] Ash was used as a cleansing agent for cooking pots and utensils.

Bəlbəlawa

(7) There was (something) called Bəlbəlawa. During the fast they would go round (performing) Bəlbəlawa, that is to a house. You go around (performing) it from house to house. Some give you dates. Some give you lentils. Some give you chickpeas. Some give you raisins. Every home that you go to will give you something. They will not send you away. They will give you anything that they have. Twenty or thirty together, small children together. They would go around in the village saying:

> (8) Bəlbəlawa
> Whoever does not give
> (Will have) a washing board (knocked) on him

(9) Then they would chastise them and they would be forced to give them food or something.

The Cultivation of Tobacco

(10) Tobacco. I'll tell you about tobacco. They would cultivate tobacco. They would plough all the fields and make them into ploughed land. After they ploughed them, they would make them into paddy fields, they would divide them into paddy field basins. They would make (the basins) into dammed sections. That is, they would divide them into dammed sections. Four or five dammed sections would be laid out[2] in a field. (11) Then they would come and (plant) the tobacco seedlings. They would put a seed in a certain place and it would grow. When they grew, they became seedlings. They uprooted the seedlings from that place and planted them in the paddy field. (12) They put water in the paddy field. They put water in the paddy field so that it would become soft. They would bring a seedling and plant it. They would plant it in the paddy field. The paddy field was almost two metres long, two or three metres. (13) They would bring the sprigs of tobacco, ten stems (in a row). They would plant them in the paddy field, one, two, three and count up to ten. Ten in this (row), ten in that one, ten in that other one, and so forth. They did the same with aubergines and also did this with cucumbers. But not with melons.

(14) They would cultivate melons and watermelons in the same way but without water. They would plant them and they would grow. Also for turnips they would not make paddy fields. They would cultivate them in the same way, they would plant a seed like this and cultivate them, like melons. (15) But aubergines, potatoes, tobacco, cucumbers, for all of these they would make paddy fields. They would irrigate them with water. Every eight days they would feed them with water, that is the tobacco, the aubergines, the cucumbers, and so forth. (16) When the tobacco became big, they would clip it down. They would cut it. They would bind it in bunches, each (containing) five or six (plants). They would bind it in bundles and place them on either a long stick or a rope. They would bind them to a stick, with a stick this side and a stick that side. They would bring a rope and put the tobacco on it in order to dry. (17) After the tobacco dried, they took it, put it on a blanket and crushed it thoroughly. They would throw away all the wooden (twigs) of the tobacco. They would bring a sieve, a large sieve, whatever you want. First they put them in a large sieve then in a medium sized sieve, until the tobacco came out. There were some small pieces that came out, this small stuff they threw away. It was very small, it became like flour. They threw it out. (18) They put it in the medium sized sieve and they put in a sack whatever was produced of good quality. They put it in a sack and put it aside. They took some of that tobacco whenever they needed it and smoked it. They put the tobacco in small bags, which they all had and which contained a kilo. They would put a kilo of tobacco in them. (19) They had a sparking tool made of metal. They also had a red stone and hay kindling from a tree. They kindled this in their pipe.[3] The stem of the pipe was long. They would bring a glowing coal. They would take a glowing coal and put it on the pipe. They would put some hay kindling on it and light the hay, then put it on the pipe. Then they would begin to smoke.

The Churn

(20) At that time in the villages in our land we had a churn. A churn is made from a sheep, the skin of a sheep. They tied to it sticks and beams.[4] They inflated it, put air into it. They left it in the sun to dry, so that it would not give off a smell.

(21) They put yoghurt in it and put water in it, then shook it. Yoghurt water (dawwe) would be produced and butter (məšxa) would be produced separated (from the yoghurt water). They would take it (the butter) away. (22) They would boil the yoghurt water and put it in a bag. The water would drip down from it. The water would drain down from it, and it would become xalwa,[5] which was dry, like this. (23) They made it into a ḳaška. (To make) the ḳaška, they again added water and put it in the sun to dry. For winter they reconstituted it. They crushed it in hot water and it became yoghurt water, with which they would make stew and yoghurt pasties. (24) When they sang (the song) about it, two girls held it, one from above it and one from below it.[6] They would put their leg in front of it. The latter woman, who was under it, would put her leg in front of it, so that when the yoghurt (churn) moved, it struck her leg and returned back. The butter all gathered together.

[5] A fatless residue.

[6] The women sang in turns a special song concerning the churn when they churned the yoghurt. For the text of this song see C5.

Family History

(1) The first ones settled there, our people came later, our family of Hɛdo. Two brothers came, Daniye and Bǝnyame. Bǝnyame is the grandfather of my father. Daniye is the grandfather of your grandfather.[1] After those two brothers, we know how many offspring there have been until now. (2) My brother Lewis went to visit us from Chicago and asked me. I told everything and he wrote it down. He wrote down how many are descended from that brother and how many from that (other) brother. (3) Seven brothers had come to the village. They (the two other brothers) came and the inhabitants of 'Ɛn-Nune said 'This village is ours. You cannot live in it'. They went up to the top of the shady mountain. (4) They (the inhabitants of 'Ɛn-Nune) said 'No, no, let also them come (and settle here). What can we do by ourselves here? Let also those people settle'. (5) So, our people settled there. Our people were more strong, more active and finer men (than those already there). That is what we know. At that time I was not even born. After they came from Urmi, I was born in Baghdad. I heard this from my mother, from my older cousins. The old folk would talk about this. I heard it from my youth.

(8) My father, he was the youngest of the brothers. He brought up my cousins (until) they got married. I remember we were all in one house. After they married (there were) also their children, and there were grandchildren. (9) In the end, I remember, we all separated. We went to Ṛombi to the house of my brother. We set up home in Ṛombi, not in 'ɛn-Nune. It was a pleasant, high place, full of rasa grass, a fine place. (10) My father set up home there. We went—I have a memory of myself (going) and of my older brother (going). This brother of mine[2] was born there. I remember when my brother was born.

(11) In the winter (we had a container known as a) markən, one for honey, one for butter, one for jajək, one for cheese and the yoghurt (was in another). My mother arranged them all like this. (12) At that time my brother used to come and I (would say) 'My brother, you are so sweet like honey'. He would run and go (shouting) makke! makke! makke is markən (in child's language). He was young, there was honey in the pot. My brother liked honey. My brother would say 'makke, makke' to eat honey. (13) These brothers of mine were young. It was I who was the oldest. They were young. What else should I say, my dear? While my brothers were young, my father died. My mother brought them up and married them off. (14) The children of my brother were born. How old was my mother? You know.[3] My mother died young. The father of my mother was a priest and my father was a priest. (15) My mother was not educated, but she knew a lot. My mother could recite the whole Gospel, which they read before the priest. Today, everything that I hear here, my mother has told me and I know it. Before Sargon Dardišu[4] said it, and they sat in it (the television), talking and preaching about Christians and Assyrians, my mother used to tell us everything.

(16) My father taught us prayers. He (my brother)[5] was not born. (He taught me and) my elder brother in Chicago, my brother Lewis. He taught us prayers: Our heavenly father. Peace be upon you Mary. He taught us all the prayers.

(17) (At that time) they were Catholics.[6] We used to make confession. It is a sin. Do not steal. Do not curse. I and my brother would sit and make confession, make confession to the priest Warda. (18) I and my brother sat, she (our mother) put us together to say prayers. 'Say the prayers like this. Have you not cursed?' We said 'No, we have not cursed'. 'Have you not stolen?' We said 'Yes, we have stolen'. 'What have you stolen?' (19) We said 'Plums from the house of my uncle Čuna, a few fresh plums, which were growing there'. We had just picked plums, I and my brother. How afraid we were. It was a sin, my dear. Our father and mother taught us like that. (20) The school was at home. Everything that a person learns as a young child, this remains in the mind of a person. Now I forget things, but I remember well what (I learnt) then.

Weddings

(21) I remember the wedding of my brother Šəmmo, when people had fled and come down to Badɛrəške.[7] The Levy army went up to 'Ɛn-Nune. It was then that Šəmmo married. I remember the English, the Levy army. At that time the borders were moved, they were moved up to Turkey.

(22) At weddings there were the drum and pipe. They used to wear Ṭiyare clothes. There was merriment, dancing, the drum and pipe, however many days the wedding lasted. They would go and bring out the bride and bring her to the house of the groom. The wedding could last for three days, a wedding could last for a week. There was dancing, singing, cooking in pans, slaughtering of oxen. As for the washing of the groom (they would sing):

> (23) Let us go to wash him
> The bridesmaids are in flocks and flocks
> The friends of the groom are at his father's house

(24) Let us go to wash him
Let us sprinkle him with rose water

(25) They would shake the tree for the groom. They stood the tree on the roof. They would sell it and say:

(26) Our tree has withered
The hand of the best man is numb
Where is his uncle to buy it?

(27) Then his uncle would come out. My aunt Xawa taught us this, when Šəmmo married the last time. We washed Šəmmo under the smooth mulberry tree.

(28) Our tree is a pear tree
In the middle is a tray
It has been bought by Yawsəp[8] for a male goat

(29) Our tree is an apple tree
It is decorated above and below
It has been bought by Yawsəp for a beehive

(30) At the wedding of Gwərgəs did not my aunt buy his cake and say '(I buy it) for a beehive'? (31) They would deck the tree, prepare it and decorate it. They would put everything on it. Pomegranates and the like, pears, quinces. They would also paint eggs and place them on it. (32) The best man would hold it in his hand. The groom and the best man would go up onto the roof. They made the bride stand at the door. When the bride came, they would give her butter and say to her 'Draw a cross for me like this on the door of the house'. (33) Indeed this had a meaning, all these things were Assyrian customs. They would bring oil and would bring a pot full of walnuts, raisins, terebinth nuts, sweets, everything. (It was) a pot. They call it 'the bride's pot'. It was for the bride to break in order that she could finally enter the house. (34) She would apply the oil, while the groom was standing on the roof. From the roof he strikes his foot on the eves like this and a little earth falls onto the head of the bride. Finally she enters. But her father, her brother, her mother, of the bride—they say to them 'If you do not offer something, she will not enter the house'.

(35) They would give her something. My mother-in-law put a yellow gold coin for me in the hand of my brother Ishəq. My cousin said 'She will not enter until her mother has brought me a yellow gold coin'. She brought it. (36) This was so that people would buy the tree, so that they would buy it, so that it would be a help for the groom, so that it would be a help, so that his own relatives would buy it, first his uncle. Don't you hear them saying?:

> (37) Our tree has dried out
> The hand of the best man is numb
> Where is his uncle to buy it?

(38) First his uncle would buy it and then they would hold an auction 'Who wants to buy it?' All his relatives who were there (would buy it). One would buy it and say 'I give it back to you'.[9] The buying was like that. (39) When his relatives finished (buying), they then shook the tree. The young children would flock together to pick up quinces, pick up apples. The young children would pick up what was hung on the tree. (40) Finally they would tie the bands (in the wedding chamber). The priests would come. There was faith at that time. Now faith has gone, it has diminished. They would tie the bands. Priests and deacons would come. They would read (prayers) and tie the bands. (41) The groom and bride would sit. The best man and woman would sit. Then all the friends of the groom would dance and sing. That is what weddings were like.

Baptisms

(42) We would bring sweets, we would bring various things to the church, beautiful clothes, coronet decorations, which they would put on the clothes. They brought the babies and the priest performed (the baptism) on them. (43) He made a sign of the cross on them, marking them with olive oil. There was a font. The priests all read (prayers) and they immersed them in the water. Just like Christ, our Lord Christ, who was baptized, so they used to baptize also young children. (44) If there were many children he (the priest) said 'Who will be the first to be baptized?' Whoever put (his child) first would give more money.

B9 A Miraculous Escape from Kurds

Informant: Bibe Bənyamən (ʾƐn-Nune)

(1) When our people were travelling in the mountains, there were many Kurds (pursuing) after them. Some Kurds encountered them. When they saw them, my father fled. (Our group consisted of) my father the priest, the priest Bənyame, my mother Xənzada and my three siblings. I had a sister and two brothers. (2) My father fled. The Kurds ran after him. My mother crouched down (over the children), since my siblings were small. My father was very athletic and ran off. He ran and ran and came to a mountain slope that (extended) downwards. (3) He said 'However much I run, a gun will still reach me, they will shoot a gun at me and kill me. What shall I do?' There was no place to shelter. He saw a rock, there was a rock here and a rock here, the top was completely exposed. (4) He said 'I shall go in here. They will kill me. If I run down the slope, they will kill me. I shall go in here between the rocks. On the slope they would kill me. If they do not catch me, the shots will reach me'. He said:[1] I entered there. (5) The Kurds who were running after him were five (in number). They were five men from (the village of) Bedu.[2] My mother knew that they were from Bedu by their appearance. My father used to tell this story and I heard everything. He would tell it in this way. (6) The Kurds came and God blinded their eyes. They stood, on this rock and and on this rock, one leg on that rock and one on that rock. My father saw them. He looked at them and said 'They will kill me now'. They were looking into the distance and said 'Has he flown away? Has he gone up into the sky? Where has he gone?' They did not see him. God blinded their eyes. (7) He said 'They will kill me know'. They did not see him and went back. They went back. My mother was sitting with my siblings. How can I tell this brother?[3] (8) She was sitting and they said 'Where are you from?' She said 'I am the daughter-in-law of the priest Hɛdo'. They knew her. Those Kurds were from our land. This was our village and this was the village of the Kurds (next to it). This one (of ours) was (a village) of Christians. The Kurds and Christians (lived next to each other)—the villages of the Barwar land were like that.

(12) She extracted a promise from the Kurds saying 'I tell you that I shall go down with you on this condition that you do not say "Become a Kurd"'.[5] They said 'Why won't you become one?'. She said: I gripped a cross in my hand out of fear. The cross was in my hand like this. (13) I said 'No'. I said 'No. I am content for you to kill me. But, I say to you one thing. I implore you,[6] do not kill my children before my eyes. After you kill me, then kill also my children, kill them by my side'. They said 'You want us to kill you? Is that really your wish?' (14) She said 'With all my heart I want you to kill me, for I shall not become a Kurd'. 'Won't you become a Kurd?' She said 'No'. She said: They were five men, five. Now, two remained behind. They said 'Kill her and come (back to us)'. (15) My mother taught my siblings. She said 'My dear, those Kurds know nothing, they are heathens. They know nothing. As for us, there is God, there is Christ, there is Paradise, there is Hell. If they kill us, we would die one day (anyhow). We shall go to Paradise, if they kill us today we shall go there directly. It will be (our fate) to die one day anyhow. We shall not become Kurds'. (16) She taught them (thus). She taught them all the prayers and they knew them. My mother taught them. My younger brother was on milk. But my elder brother and my sister understood everything. My mother and father taught them to pray and they knew. (17) So, three went away and two remained. My mother said: I said 'I am not afraid even a little. If they kill us (so be it). What shall we do here in this world? We shall be relieved of this life that we are in, let them kill us'.

(18) She said 'I hear the sound (of the gun) but I am not afraid. It just makes a bang, but I am not hurt, nothing happens to me. Bang, every time a bang but nothing'. Several times the guns were pointed at her back, bang, but (nothing) happened. (19) She said 'I do not feel anything on me. Nothing is happening to me. The gun is just making a bang and I hear its sound, but nothing happens'. (20) So, those who had gone, those three called the two (who had remained) and said 'What have you been doing until now? What have you been doing until now?' (21) They said 'It is a miracle! We have seen a miracle!' They said 'What?' They said 'Every bullet that we put in this gun comes out (as a blank) with a bang. We take it out and throw it away, then put in another one, but also that one comes out (as a blank) with a bang. We point it at her back to kill her, but the bullet comes out (as a blank) with a bang'. (22) I don't know how many bullets they fired at them. They (the three Kurds) went away from them. Those Kurds shouted at them saying 'God was not surrendering her into your hands'. (23) They said 'Leave her, leave her. She is a martyr. She is a martyr'.[7] The Kurds were afraid. They said 'By God, do not kill her! She is a good woman. God was not surrendering her into your hands'. After she had come and told the people, they told her (what it meant). She did not know Kurdish. (24) They went off, but they captured my brother. I cannot tell that. They held him, one this shoulder and one the other, and took him away. His legs did not support him. They took him away. It was a mound, like this. They threw him on that heap of stones. He could not walk on his legs. His legs did not support him. They threw him there and went away. (25) My mother said: I stood and heard the sound of his weeping. I got up and slowly went (looking for him). I found him and took him in my arms. This place on him was scratched, wounded by the stones. (26) I said 'My dear, do not fear. The dogs have gone. God has not delivered us into their hands'. I brought him back and placed him among my siblings.[8] I put them to sleep and they slept. (27) It became dark. My father went out looking for them. He went out looking for them. He looked and looked and found them. He said 'Xənzada!'[9] He said 'Are you well?' My mother said 'I was afraid for you. You are not killed!'

Has he gone up into the sky? Where has that man gone? There is nothing here for him to hide in". The road was like this, sloping downwards. They said "We would see him wherever he could be"' (30) They did not see him. They turned back. It got dark and he (the father) came. He came and found them. He picked them up and took them away, and they went on their way. They arrived (at a place) called Walto. My mother and my brother, my siblings—my sister, Badre, died in (the convent) of the Saint of the Cells. (31) The nuns all washed her, made her a tent, made her gloves. The priests served her (the last rites). They made her a place (of burial), as we Christians do, all in rows. My mother was weeping. (32) They would say 'Sister, do not weep. God is yours, not anybody else's. Today birds eat the corpses of men, they are (left) for the birds, placed in the sun, without burial or funeral. But you—this girl (of yours) has gone directly to the Kingdom of Heaven, to Paradise, to this Saint of the Cells, as she is called'. (33) She died there in Walto, at the time when my brother Iša was on milk. Once my father was ill with a fever (and was singing), I remember his words: 'Oh my dear Iša, where were you born? In Walto in the presence of the Saint'.

Tail Fat

(1) Tail fat came from a sheep. We would slaughter the sheep, white, white small cattle. We would slaughter it, then we would fry the tail fat and put it in everything, in dolma (stuffed vine leaves), meat. We would make fried meat. We would put rice in this fried meat. The meat was very fatty. We would cook tail fat and rice, which was called qawurma. (2) On the second day of the festival (of Easter) we would make a memorial. Everybody would take down a pan of gərðo[1] or, those who wanted, chickens on rice and, those who wanted, qawurma. (This was) on the day of the gayasa ceremony, after the Easter festival. (3) People would go around (making) festival blessings and would go and hold a ceremony for the dead in the cemetery—may (death) be far from these places! Everybody would perform the ceremony. Priests, deacons would go to the graves. (4) It was not like now. They were in a village then. In all villages it (the cemetery) was behind the church, behind the church. They would go and the priests would perform the ceremony and they come back after midday and eat lunch.

(5) Tail fat is from white small cattle (sheep), a lamb, sheep, not goats, not black (small cattle), as we call them. Tail fat (comes from) white small cattle, lambs, a full grown male sheep—for qalya a full grown male sheep. We would slaughter a lamb for everyday (use). (6) For example, if today we have guests, we would slaughter, it was just enough. We would roast meat. We would make a fire, in which there were roots and large pieces of wood. We would make it into glowing embers. If we had a griddle, we would put it on the griddle, if there were a few (guests). If there were many people, no. (We would cook on) a hearth, which we would fill with kebabs of meat.

(7) Qalya is tail fat and fatty meat. They put it in first before the red meat. They would make pieces of meat small like this or, if people wanted, big. We would make meat pieces for eating. (8) We would put eggs in it (the qalya). We would cook stew in it. We would put it in praxe (stuffed vine leaves), in dolma (stuffed vine leaves), duxma (meat and barley cooked in yoghurt), məjja (dissolved yoghurt cakes), which is dawwe (yoghurt water).

(9) When we shook the churn, we would take out the č̣ita (yoghurt curds), that is we would take out the butter. We would boil the dawwe in a big pan. The yoghurt boiled and we let it separate. The water separated. The water was clear, the yoghurt water. (10) We would put it in a bag, a large bag, which we sewed specially for dawwe. We put the dawwe in and left a little in the pan. Then we hung it on a tree. There was a tree, under which we placed a vessel so that it did not scatter, so that the water of the dawwe did not scatter. (11) It became thick and we made it into a qaška (cake of dried yoghurt), like meat balls. Then we laid them out, not in the sun, we put them in the shade. It dried (to be kept) for the winter. In winter we made it into duxwa. We would dissolve it in an earthen vessel, from Dɛrəgni. Everybody had one. It had handles and a place where the dawwe flows down. (12) We strained it. We would crush barley in a mortar. We winnowed it and removed the husks. We washed it and added meat, added tail fat, added bones. The bones were dry, the bones were dried. We would put it in the duxwa. It cooked while we sat stirring it, for a hundred years! (13) Turnips, yes, we added turnips. But here (in London) we have come to put meat balls (in duxwa). (This was the case) in Moṣul and such places, but not us in Barwar. We would make gərðo. As for xumṣa, we would mash meat in rice. The rice was the third one (in the degree of fineness).[2] In the first round (of sieving) we make (ordinary) rice. In the second round (we make) dolma. The third round, the fine one (with the) fine sieve, crushed rice. (14) We would soften it and put meat in it, then mash it. We did not put meat balls in it. We do that here, that is in a town, in Moṣul, in Baghdad. It had to be all meat. We used to take a large cutlet of meat. It used to cook in the xumṣa, (together with) bones, turnips and so forth. (15) We would clean sumac berries. We would put sumac berries in water and boil them. There was a froth on top, as we call it. They would strain this and put it in the rice. (It was) water of sumac berries.

Rice Dishes

GK: What did you make with rice?

(16) With rice we would make xumṣa, we would make meat balls with rice. We called it meat balls with sauce. We would put tomatoes and tomato purée in the sauce. But the dish consisting only of xumṣa is whitish. We did not put any red tomatoes in it.

(17) We would make dolma, we would make gǝrðo and stew. The gǝrðo, which is thick, is for church memorial festivals.[3] But the stew, which we made for ourselves, was somewhat watery, but not too much. (18) We would put in it oil, tahini, crushed sesame. Raisin syrup, yes, but we rarely used it.[4] But we used to have it. My uncle's family used to make it in Musakka,[5] (where there were) many of those black grapes.

Dolma

GK: and dolma?

(19) Yes, by God! Every two or three days. If there was meat, if we had slaughtered sheep, we would serve meat. We did not use celery in our community. We did not use it. Now we use it. Onion and garlic, rice, leaves, vine leaves, chard leaves, cabbage leaves. Onion was always in it. A head of garlic, like that. (20) We would make two types. My uncle's family and the family of my mother's uncle did not like garlic. Nor did they like onions. We would add (onions) but say to them 'no' (we have not added it). But garlic never came near them.

Cheese

GK: How did you make cheese?

(21) We would collect a lot of milk, four times. We would collect it in a pot and strain it. We would put lots of it (in the pot) and heat it up slightly. They would make a cheese rennet. I don't know what it was from. (They would add) peppers, spices, and would add something else, black pepper, the big one, not the crushed one. (22) Not everybody knows how to make it. Only a few women make it. My mother learnt from her mother, who was from Ashitha. It was not possible for it to remain a year in the house. They prepared it from time to time for a few days. In the Spring there was a lot of milk and they would make cheese, but in Summer they could not, since the milk was in short supply.

[3] I.e. gǝrðo and stew (bušala) are similar dishes consisting of rice cooked in yoghurt, but gǝrðo is the thicker of the two.

[4] Literally: In a thousand (times) we did not use it much.

(23) They would heat it slightly. They did not boil it. They would heat it slightly, add rennet and cover it, then it would become cheese. They would put it in a bag, then lay it out. We had flat stones, one beneath and one above, so that it was compressed and became cheese. It was like this in rounds. They would cut it with a large knife.

GK: Did they put sərke[6] in it?

(24) No, but we put sərke in jajək. No. We would put a layer of it, that is jajək, and a (layer of) cheese on top of it, then we would put sərke in it. They would make it (like this) and then mix it together. We used to call (the herb) sərmo. We would bury it in the earth. If we put (a herb in it), we would put sərmo in it. (25) If we wanted (to use) garlic for cooking, it was up to us. If we want, we cook (with it), (if we do not) want, we don't. In Spring we make everything from it. We would fry it and put it in a frying pan. We would put the frying pan on the embers.

Yoghurt

GK: Did you make yoghurt?

(26) Yoghurt—we would fetch milk and boil it. It would cool slightly. We would put a portion of yoghurt in it and it would become yoghurt. That yoghurt would become sour. We would leave it and shake it in a churn. We would serve it as dawwe. We would extract butter. (We used) dawwe also for (making) qaška, for cooking, for drinking, dawwe (was used) for everything.

Weddings

(27) They made preparations. For eight days we would bake bread. We would prepare the tree. For the tree they would bring all kinds of fruit. They would set up the tree. At that time there was no cake. They would go up onto the roof, at the time when they brought the bride and shake it. (28) They would buy it—it was the uncle of the groom (who bought it first). He would sell the tree. Then other people bought it. They joined in. We used to sell the tree. Weddings were like that in the old days.

(29) They would make preparations for the wedding. They would slaughter sheep, they would cook, they prepared food, they prepared arak and wine, and all sorts of things, to drink. We would make pickles by ourselves. We would put them (the drinks) in pots, large pots, the ones used for water.

GK: What were the clothes of the bride like?

(30) Stockings, shoes, long clothes, clothes of purple fabric, a dress of purple fabric, a velvet waist-coat, all made of embroidered zargǝf fabric, a head-scarf, and a rose, which they would put in the head-scarf like this, a belt, a necklace. (31) In the old days people would dress up for a wedding. They would put on silver bangles (on their veils). They would put on a belt. They would put on earrings. They would put on a necklace. My mother had one. They were all made of silver. Bracelets. Everything was silver. A ring of silver. At that time, in the old days, there was no (special wedding) ring. They only made an (ordinary) ring, which was silver. (32) At that time they dressed her as usual. They would put on a wedding veil with a head-scarf (underneath), according to how high (the wedding veil) was.[7] The head-scarf and the wedding veil were on her head for three days, nobody uncovered her. It was not allowed for the bride to be uncovered. The cover had to be on her head. (It was) like a thin shawl, (it was) not thick.

GK: What was the clothing of the groom like?

(33) The clothing of the groom—Ṭiyare clothes, a shirt, embroidered long sleeves, a shawl, a golden dagger, if he had a golden dagger. We had one. Not everybody. Not everbody had gold. They did not ask for it (from others). In our family they did not ask, since we had one.

(34) They would fire rifles. The people who brought the bride, the people who washed the bride would fire guns. If the bride was from the village, they would take her round the village on the back of mules. They called it čappe buke. (35) She would come, enter (the house) and make with oil…and make (the sign of) the cross in oil on the door of the house. When she entered, if they did not pledge a gift for her at the door, the bride did not agree to enter. That is, gold or something. (36) The mother-in-law would say '(Take) the saucepan'.[8] The bride did not agree, but said 'I do not want the saucepan'. Then the sisters of the bride and her parents say 'No, we want you to pledge a gift for her at the door'.

He brought it at that time, but I (already) had a belt around my waist, the one belonging to my mother. He came and brought that belt and put it around my waist. He said 'Now, enter!' (38) The wedding was very pleasant in the houses, large houses, with dancing and singing. We said that it was 'in the meadows'. The wedding went on for three days. The wedding (is held) in the home of the groom, not that of the bride. (39) On the seventh day they would go to the home of the bride's father. They would invite however many they wanted and take them to the family of her father. For example, so-and-so is invited. But in our region you would invite everybody. If somebody wanted to, he would go. If he did not want, he would not. (40) At that time my father slaughtered. Sheep were slaughtered. They cooked and made xumṣa, they made rice and sauce. The groom would not eat unless they pledged something to him. Now they bring them more, they give them more. Now they only want something made of gold, a cross, bracelet, a heavy fine quality ring.

Clothing

GK: What was the everyday clothing like?

(41) Everyday clothing, for women, ordinary (clothing), blouses, jackets, skirts. Skirts (have been worn) only recently, there were no skirts (worn by women) of my generation. There were shoes, either high or low ones, according to our choice.[9] (42) The scarf, i.e kerchief, which is a piece of šalla fabric—they would tie this like this. They were big and thick. All women (wore them), then (there were) what we called satin scarves. These were red, some were black or brown. Women tied them (on their head) so that they did not have an uncovered head. (43) It was a disgrace, at that time in our community, in the whole of Barwar, there was nobody who had an uncovered head. All people, including people from Ashitha and Ṭiyare. It was not permitted for a girl to have an uncovered head. (44) They bought for us kerchiefs, scarves, blue, red, yellow. There were all colours. We would tie them (onto our heads). When we went down to church, it was a sin to go bare-headed. Here everybody goes to church with bare heads. How can that be permitted? It is a sin!

GK: Did you knit?

(46) We indeed used to knit, yes. We knitted blouses, we knitted socks. We knitted by ourselves. Whatever we wanted we knitted. We span (wool on) a spindle. We made the pure wool into balls. We would make three thin strands, which were necessary (for knitting). We would knit socks, we would knit blouses, we would knit jackets, we would knit gloves. (47) We would knit everything. Leggings for men. There was a lot of snow. The men would wear them when they went (outside), so that their legs did not suffer (from the cold). We would knit for my father, for my brother. (48) The Jews and the people from Gramun had a loom on which they made clothes, that is Ṭiyare clothes. They would weave knapsacks (for women) and bags (for men).

GK: How did you make wool?

(49) We would tease the wool. There was a comb. There was a comb, on which there were many teeth.[10] We would tease it, comb it (until it was) so beautiful. First we took the best for clothes. The rest we called bərgawa (inferior quality wool), which was thinner. This we span to make into socks, blouses, gloves, leggings. (50) A hat was only wool. They pressed it. It was (made of) wool of lambs. They would make it into hats. We have Ṭiyare clothes. We would knit shawls. The people from Ashitha produced the neck shawl, (made of) lace. I have knitted with this. We used to knit these at home. We knitted everything by hand.

In big houses they made rooms like this one, wider. The rooms were big. This is a sitting room, for sitting, also in ʾƐn-Nune (we had one like this).

(52) There were many villas with six or seven rooms, eight rooms. Whoever built (such a house)—half the village (built them), some built some did not. Those who were in the Levies, those who had wages had a villa. They would send money and build houses.

(53) In the house, underneath, there were basement stables. A basement for animals. The door for this, however, was not together with the door for people on this other side. For example, if this is our door, (the door of the basement) was on the other side, here, outside. Sheep, goats, each had its place. (54) If somebody did not want it under the houses and needed the lower rooms, he would make a (separate) stable. Plots of land were abundant. They would go and build a stable consisting of two rooms, out of mud. They made it into a stable for animals. Whoever had the means, had many sheep.

(55) In the Spring there was an enclosure. The enclosure was woven outside out of wood and leaves. In the Spring it was warm. When it rained, they brought them into the stable. There were special stables for sheep, special ones for oxen and for lambs, by themselves. Sheep were by themselves, cows and oxen, they were all by themselves. (56) Sheep are delicate, if an ox strikes them it would kill them. Each had its own room. They made them like that. They would put out grass and put out leaves. Each time—they had times (for feeding), that is four o'clock is the animals' dinner time.

(57) Our house was only mud. But it did not seem so. They would lay stones and mud like these walls. They would lay stones, all were at hand. Bricks were not possible.[11] We are not in the plains. They would make windows.

(58) We would sleep on the roof in summer. In summer, before the rains finished, sometimes we went up and it rained, sometimes it did not. (There were) mosquito nets. Everybody (went up) with his bed, a wooden bed. We all erected sticks of wood and hung the mosquito net on them. (59) We ourselves would sew the nets, we sewed them by hand. We sewed them by machine. The ones who had a machine were those (families) that were large. We started (making the nets) from winter time until 'the season of the roof'. Not every year. Every few years. They would get torn and cut and we sewed (nets) to replace them. In the winter we sewed for the summer.

GK: How did you go up to the roof?

(60) A ladder. A ladder—some had (ladders with) rungs, with thin rungs, some had (a ladder of) planks, like a staircase, wide rungs like steps. We put our bundles on the roof. Steps are made of stone, but a ladder is made of wood, like the ones that the electricity workers climb up. Our ladder was like that.

GK: Where did you get water from?

(61) Water—we have springs. One spring is called the spring of Ḳutto. It is on one side of the village. We have the spring of the church. Its water never dries up, in summer or winter. We have two springs. One we call the one of the lower district, the other the one of the upper district of our village.

GK: How do you fetch water?

(62) Vessels, cans, oil cans, with a small mouth, a can. It was sealed, a sealed oil can. We poured it away, put ash into it and cleaned it well. We put it in the sun for eight days. For those who were large families, the water of pots, jars and gourds was not enough. (63) We often went to fetch water. We did not last from morning to evening without fetching (more), no. Every so often one of us would run off to the spring and fetch cold water. It was like that. (64) There was no fridge in the old days. Now everything is available. A tap in the house. Taps were installed in the sixties. (After) 1960 taps, electricity and everything were installed.

GK: Where did people wash?

(65) Each person washed in his own garden. Each made a wash room, wove it like this. They would weave it first with twigs, leaves, and then put sesame grass onto it. They only left a place for the smoke to come out. (66) The water came from a channel. There was a channel running directly (into the washroom). We would boil it. We would fetch wood and put it (on the fire). There was a large pan, like this, with handles. We put it on the hearth, until the last (member of the family had finished washing). The water was always kept hot. (67) We took water from the channel and put it in the pan. Also now our bathroom here is the same. There was raggʸe soap and earth. As for a woman who had (long) hair, which would not (comb) down with soap, they would apply mud. (68) There was a type of mud, which was oily, red mud. We would go down and, once every year, we would collect this mud. When it was Spring, we would collect the mud and put it aside. If a woman had hair that would not (comb) down, since it was very abundant and thick, they would apply this mud and you would see how they made it go down (with the comb), they would comb it in water.

(69) By hand. In a bowl there in the washroom. In the washroom they stripped off. They all washed, young and old, then two women remained in the river channel. I used to wash and my sister used to rinse, then we laid it out to dry. We also would bathe and go home across the fields. Nowadays, however, the washrooms are in the houses. People do not go into the fields.

GK: In winter how do you heat the houses?

(70) A stove of wood. It was all wood. People would go and fetch wood in summer for the winter. They would bring twigs, they would cut down leaves and go home. They would bring thin pieces of wood. We would break them all. We would not bring a single twig into the house without breaking it. We would break everything outside. (71) We would bring it up and put it aside, in the porch, and each time we would bring some in and light the stove. Big pieces of wood do not ignite straightaway. We would put some of those small pieces in it and they would burn until evening. Then you would put one or two other thick pieces of wood and it would burn by itself.

GK: Where was the stove?

(72) The stove was in a room. We placed it in the middle of the room. There were pipes, like tubes. These pipes came out onto the roof.

GK: (What about) smoke?

(73) Smoke. The smoke went up. It was not in the house. We placed the pipes one on top of the other, it went out onto the roof. We made them quite high. The smoke would go away. Even on the roof there was no smoke. Every fifteen days we would shake those pipes and take them off, (knocking them) tap tap on the ground (to clean them).

GK: (What about) the roof?

(74) They would roll it. They would lay down straw and roll it, so that drips (of water) would not come down (into the house). A large roller, nobody can lift it. (You needed) many men to lift it onto the roof.

GK: (Tell me) the name of vessels.

(75) The names of vessels. We called this a zawərta (water pot). One we call a markɪn (pot). One we call a kawaza (small water jar). One we call a gourd. Gourds were like this. They were for water. There were linyaθa or line (pots), green pots. They would put butter in them.

(76) They would say that it does not lose its taste at all. It keeps its taste. There were many (pots) in which the butter remained for two years. There were some (in which it remained) one year. They would put it in those pots. The burra was for yeast. They brought them from Dɛrəgni.[12] We would each buy one. Each person would have one. (77) There was a potty for young children sleeping in a cradle, in a cot. They did not urinate on themselves, but it flowed down into this (pot). We would take it, clean it and sterilize it, then put it back. It had a pipe. We set it up for a young child, we set up a joining piece, a soft joining piece. We set this up and his urine and his exrement would go down into it, into the potty. Nobody saw it, when the child was asleep. He got up and we took it and cleaned it.

(78) There was a rug, a rug of wool. Everybody had four or five. They made it out of wool. They pressed (the wool) of sheep in Spring. There were people who were specially responsible for this job. (79) Carpets, in the old days there were no carpets. We made big rugs. They made them into rolls. They twisted the wool. Many men (were needed to) make it. They made embroideries in them of black wool, triangles, they made crosses, they made flowers. We would spread them out (on the floor).

GK: Where did people sit?

(80) People sat on the ground and all around there were cushions. We laid out cushions. In recent times, carpenters have come up from Amedia and from Moṣul and everybody has made (furniture) for himself. They have walnut wood. They fell the walnut wood this year to make couches next year. (They made) by hand couches, tables, side tables, wardrobes—they made everything. In the old days they would lay out only a rug and sit on it. They would make cushions of wool and laid them around for people to lean on.

GK: At night where did the light come from?

(81) Lamps, lamps. In the old days, oil lamps. In the old days they would put out oil lamps. They would put out sesame oil, what do we call it?

(82) No, they extracted (the oil) of the walnut tree for the church. I myself do not remember that. But my mother used to tell me and say that we used to make lamp oil from the oil of sesame or whatever was available. They put in the oil lamp something small like this, but it stayed a long time. They twisted it (i.e. the wick of the lamp) like this and put it out. (83) They hung them up and would knit and sew, Amedia stitching (cross-stitch). After oil lamps, came (paraffin) lamps, wall lamps, fānūs they say in Arabic. We say wall lamps or hand lamps. There are small ones. We would buy four or five. Everybody had one. (84) People would go down (to see) the sheep (in the basement stable), they would go down when the cows were giving birth. Everybody had one. We had two or three. We put them outside in the porch. Two or three were hung in the house. (85) They hung them up and we would weave lace pieces and embroider them. We would put paraffin in them every day in the evening, at four o'clock. All our lamps were swept out, prepared and set for us to light them.

(86) We had a porch, where we set up a hearth. We made a hearth like this, one stone here, another stone here, and here. We laid wood and set up a can. We would make a hole in the can, an oil can, right? We would flatten it and the young children would make holes in it. We put cooking pots on it. (87) We made a fire. As soon as it boiled, we pulled away the wood and it became embers, and the food would cook very slowly. We would bake thin bread. We would bake flat breads in the oven. We would bake three or four types of bread. (88) We would bake qəllora. (This was) maize seeds. We brought them down to the water-mill and ground them. Not everybody, but we did, whoever wanted to. We would go down and take the maize seed down, grind it and make it into fine flour. (89) We would knead it and put leaven in it, then baked it. We baked it when it was thick so that we could stick it onto the oven. (We put) a little flour here and a little here and baked it. This was indeed very tasty. It is called qəllora. (90) Žeðaye (flat breads) are made of wheat. (There was) millet, fine millet. Here (in London) I have seen people put out millet for the birds. Barley bread. (91) We used to bake four types. We had wheat. People had an appetite (for different breads). If we felt like it, we made them. We ground a little (flour), like this. We baked for a few days. This was all in the oven, not in the house. (92) For example, this village of ours, our village of 'Ɛn-Nune was big, we had baker women. (These were) two women, one this side (of the village), one the other, each one with her tribe, as I used to say. (93) We had aunt Širine and aunt Xamme, who baked bread. The women would bake and take (the bread) and put it on the oven. She (aunt Xamme) would bake whichever (dough) had risen. Also the other one, aunt Širine.

(94) There were two ovens in the village. In the old days there were two ovens. Now every house has an oven. Recently there have not been any baker women. The village has become large. There were places (for baking), but everybody has built an oven for himself.

GK: Did you use a marzaq?

(95) (A marzaq was only used for) ṭəlme and lawaše. We would press it down and she (the baker woman) would stick it (onto the oven). We baked these in the oven, they were very delicious. When it was, for example, the (fast of) the Rogation of the Ninevites, we had to bake ṭəlme. We all baked them in the oven. We would put out five or six ṭəlme, rolling them out (and used) a marzəq. They were large. Ẕeδaye no, we (made them) by hand.

Implements

(96) We would make spoons out of wood. My late father made 'stirring' spoons. But there were no forks. There were no forks. We do not eat with forks. We do not eat with knives and forks.

(97) Pokers (badode)—we used to stir the fire (with them).

(98) Tongs (gazza)—we would pick up the bread with them in the oven.

(99) What did we clean with? We would boil ash. This was always the ash of the terebinth tree.

(100) The spoons—there is a special tree for those spoons. We call it 'wood of the king'. In all of the Barwar region there are three places (where it grows). My father used to go up from morning until evening and bring back a piece of wood. He would sit down and make spoons. He had a trowel, he had an axe. He made everything. He made them beautiful. My father made spoons for all the village.

(1) Games were divided into four seasons. All games would not be played at all times. There were those of Spring, there were those of Summer, there were those of Autumn and there were those of Winter. Every season had its games. (2) For example, let's take bərbərrane. They would play bərbərrane in Spring, mostly in the evening, at night, since in the day the young people, that is the boys, were all busy with work, and the men were (busy with) cultivating, constructing the places for cultivation and digging. They could not play during the daytime. (3) They would come in the evening and gather together wanting to have fun. There was no television, there was nothing. They wanted to have fun. How did they have fun? They had games. This was one game, on days when the moon was very bright, the light was good, in one of the fields that were empty, which were near to the village, all the men and youngsters gathered together. (4) They formed into two sides, each side (playing) together. When they made two teams, they would find, for example, that these two people are strong (and would put) one on one side and one on the other.[1] (They would find) that these two were rather weaker (than the others), (so they would put) one on one side and one on the other. (5) (They would find) that these were younger (than the others), (so they would put) one on one side and one on the other. (This was) so that the two teams would be equal in strength, so that one was not weak and the other strong. (6) Then they would put a stone in their hands. They would put it behind their back and turn the stone in the other direction (away from the other team). The leader of this team would ask the other team 'In which (hand) is the stone?' If somebody knew in which one the stone was, they went outside. (7) Those who did not know, those who lost, remained inside. Inside they occupied a place, a place which we call 'a target', as they say. This was a place or piece of wood which they took hold of and stood in front of it. Those who went away, those who won, would run away. Those who lost remained inside.

(8) They go and strike the others with their hand. If one touches one of the others, one who is outside, he (the one who is outside) falls, he is finished with the game, he is out.[2] But those who are outside come in front of those who have come out from inside, come out to the outside, running in front of them and anybody whom they cut off from among those from inside is also finished, he also 'dies'. That is also his turn has finished. (9) If they break up all their group or seize the piece of wood that is in the middle, if one of those who are outside comes and seizes it, those inside lose. Again those go out, they remain outside and the others remain inside. If they do not lose, the ones that win change (place). The ones that are outside come inside and the ones inside go outside. We shall not dwell longer on (the game) bərrane.

(10) There are many games for you to enjoy.[3] There is (the game) šaqqa. They mostly play šaqqa in the daytime. This game is not possible at night. They play this game in the Autumn. When there is no snow, but it is cool and it is not very hot, not very warm, they play šaqqa. (11) It consists of a ball and a stick. They again form two teams, one team inside and one outside. Some come to bowl the ball. The ones who bowl the ball are inside, the others are outside. One (from outside) strikes (the ball) with the stick and the ones who are inside go out after the ball. As soon as the ball comes back and they catch the ball, the others have lost. They change places with each other.

(12) There was also this game. There is the game of 'hide-and-seek'. This is a game for the winter. In winter people were unoccupied. They gathered together. They also formed into two teams. (13) One team stands in front of a big stick, a tree, a mulberry or something. It stands there in that place, it is the target. The others go out and hide. They hide in the village. It is a village (where they live). One in that basement, one in that place, one in front of this house. They hide. (14) The others go looking for them. As soon as one sees somebody, he must strike him with his hand. If he does not strike him with his hand and he comes and holds the stick which is the place of the game, they lose. Then (they play) again. They play this game a lot in the villages. They call it by another name puq-əlli and ṭappu. Ṭappu and ṭŭš-ṭŭšo, these are all the same game.

(15) There is another game, which is also (played) only in winter: šwara barane ('jumping the rams').[4] Somebody stands like this and another here, and another, behind each other. One of them comes, one who is playing. He jumps over this one, jumps over also the other, jumps over also the other. This one stands up and jumps over the one after him. (16) This game warms you up.[5] A person who is cold warms up if he moves. They play this game a lot in the winter, when there is snow, on top of the roofs. Of course, in our village there were fifteen or twenty houses, all with one roof, all joined together. The new houses that they have built are far away from this group. They used to play various games on top of this roof.

(17) Šuta—also šuta is a winter game. (This is) because there was a lot of free time, there were not many jobs. A šuta is a wooden stick, which is five or six centimetres in height. It is sharpened, its end is sharp and broad at the bottom. In its end they put a nail. The nail is round. (18) They wind a thread around it. They grasp it in the hand and let it go, pulling the thread—this (is also called) mazreta—it turns round. They play also this. Šuta, mazreta, there is more than one name for this game: mazreta, šuta, čᵊnnara. Whereas you[6] call it čᵊnnara, we call it šuta. In Barwar we mainly use (the name) šuta.

(19) In winter they played marbles, young children, (young people) twenty years old, twenty-five years old, up to such an age people would play marbles. (20) A marble is a glass (ball), it is made of glass. It is round. It is small. They play with it. There are various games. There is (the game) of putting down odd numbers. For example, I am one, you are one, another is one. Each of us puts down however many we are who are participating, five, ten. Each of us puts down one. (21) Then we go and make an agreement on one or two metres, from where we shall shoot. We shoot a marble, each one of us one after the other. This time it is my turn. Next time it is your turn. Then it is his turn. Each time it is somebody's turn. We shoot from there. (22) (If you are) the first one and if you hit one of the others, you (continue to) play, the game is yours. Everyone who hits—that is if I have shot and hit, I take it and shoot against another and shoot against another. If I eliminate[7] them all, the game is over. I take all the marbles and put them in my pocket.

[4] I.e. a game similar to leap frog.

(23) Then we put down (marbles) again. If I do not strike, I stand on one side. Everybody shoots. If none of them strikes from two metres, the first to shoot from two metres among those odd numbers[8] begins shooting from close up. If he hits them, again he takes each one that he hits. Each one that he hits he takes. (24) Finally, if I am able to hit those who are very near me and my marble hits their marbles, he leaves the game, he has lost, he has leaves the game. This is one game. (25) There is another game, which is called ʾoṛta. This game has been introduced recently. There was something like a triangle, with three corners. They would each put down a few marbles. I and you, Awiya, Rabbi Dawid and Adriwus, each of us puts down, let's say, three marbles. (26) We put each down three in this ʾoṛta and go to a distance to shoot. We shoot. Each of us shoots. Whoever dislodges a marble comes back to shoot another one. (Whoever) dislodges it from this triangle. We take however many we dislodge. (27) When one of us is near to the other, I strike my marble against his marble and he dies, he is finished, he has lost. If I have dislodged the marbles that are in the triangle, I win them and put them in my pocket.

(28) There were other games, which I have forgotten. They also are for marbles, but I have forgotten them now. Ah, yes, ʾatkore. We make a deep hole one or two metres away. Each one shoots, from here to there. Whoever shoots into that hole wins. They make an agreement, for example I have gone down into that hole before the others, so each of them gives me a marble.

(29) Dudu—dudu was a winter game. They played it mainly on the roofs. In this one also one stands in the middle and the players strike one another. There are villages that do not have a large roof like the people of Dɛrəške. (30) They have (the space) under a mulberry, they have the smooth mulberry. There is a space under a walnut tree. They have a place in front of the church. There is a place (in other villages) that is open, in which they can play, which is an open field, in which they can play. (31) This is because the villages in Barwar are situated in the mountains, so there are not many places with open fields that are available for us, as is the case with the plain of Moṣul, and the other plains.

(32) Remind me of other games. In summer there is a kind of sport, they built—we have a river, it is called the river Be-xelape. It springs from Bedo and Ora, flows through Maye, Dɛrəške, ’ɛn-Nune and goes down to ’Iyyət, Bəšmiyaye, Ṭərwanəš, the villages of Sɛra and Sɛrdašte, until it goes down into the Zab. (33) Now, in every village, people would go down and build a wall in the river opposite their village and it would become like a pool. All the young people of the village would go down and swim in that pool. This was in summer. (34) In summer it was very hot at midday, the time of lunch, the time of xădaya (lunch) as our people used to say in the old days—xădaya, (the word) kawuθra is now new. At that time (midday) they would eat lunch and go down to the water, to the river and swim there. (35) The young people would enjoy themselves there for one, two, three hours, until they went back to tend to the oxen and tend to the sheep. The jobs that they had include harvesting, and so forth. They would go on from there to do their jobs, after leaving the water. (By then) it was cooler.

Two girls would strike the hand of one another and one would run off. When they struck her hand, she would run off and enter into the hole. (2) Then she would come out and go elsewhere and then go to some other place. The other girl has to follow after her. Every place that she goes to and enters, the other has to follow after her. If she makes a mistake (and enters the wrong place), she sits down. They play this game for fun.

(1) There were many games when we used to play as youngsters. We used to place a warm stone (on the ground). It heated in a fire. We would hide our eyes and we would see who could find it. We threw the stone and started looking for it—it was dark—until we found the stone and (one of) us would say 'Here, I have found it!'.

(2) There was another game called the game of the names of the goat. We would do something, (a draw of lots with) leaves, and see who would bend down (like a goat). Then somebody would give him his name, some part of a goat—horn, ear, stomach. He would jump and say 'What (is my name)?' (Somebody would say) 'Ear?' 'No, it is not "Ear". What is it?' (Somebody says) 'Mouth?' 'Yes, you are right'. 'You are "Mouth"' 'you come and bend over'. This was another game.

They would put earth around it and bury it. When it was winter, they would take it out. (It had) a very delicious taste.

The Church of Mar Gwirgis

(The informant is describing a model of the church which is in front of him)
   (2) The name of that church is—(may my life be) a redemption for his power—Saint George. It was built in very ancient times. In the old days (there was) this ladder, which you see here behind it, and this ladder was inside, here. In the old days people would come and enter from here, going up from here to the roof, into the church. (3) It had a wall. You can enter into the wall. Perhaps people, brigands or something, would come and this wall was there so that they would not find people and shoot them and kill them, then enter and rob the church.
   (4) (Through) this door you would enter into (the sanctuary of) the altar—here is the altar. You would go into (the sanctuary of) the altar. There they would take communion and then come out. Inside there were no chairs. Everybody stood. (5) All its floor—the church was built inside in such a way that when you entered it echoed the voice back. This was because its interior was an arch, round like this. It was round and its interior consisted of interlocking sections.[1] What were these for? In order to make an echo. Its floor was all large flat stones.

The Festival of Musarde

(6) At (the festival of) musarde people would sprinkle water on each other. The day of musarde was the day when the people went to take communion. When they had finished communion, they made a memorial. In the courtyard, everybody sat and ate. After that they would go out, each with a scoop in his hand, and would sprinkle each other (with water). They would bring young children. We would sprinkle each other in an irrigation channel.

Bee-Keeping

(7) We had our own bees. A swarm forms in this month.[2] Before the swarm forms in this month, we make a new hive. We bring pliant twigs. We cut these twigs and push them into the ground, according to how large we want the hive to be. We weave the twigs, let's say up to a height of a metre. It is all round, forty centimetres, thirty centimetres in diameter. (8) After we have finished weaving and we have plaited it and left a hole in one side, we go into the basement stable and fetch a vessel. We have water there in the garden, outside. We fetch ox dung, which we call šăre, in the vessel. We knead it with our hands and plaster it onto the thing that we have woven. We plaster it until it dries. (9) Why is that? (Why) have we plastered on that dung of oxen, which is called šăre? So that it will be warm for them in the winter. When it has dried and we see a swarm that has formed, I said to my late father Odisho 'What should we do? Father, a swarm has formed'. My father said 'Take some stones and knock them together'. (10) Why do we take stones and knock them together? The swarm of bees hears the sound of the stone, spins around and settles on a branch. After it has settled, we have a stick, a wooden stick as long as from here to the door. We cover our faces so that the bees do not sting us. (11) We put out the hive that I have newly made. I put it out there. We bring dawwe water. We bring this and put it on the stick, we smear the stick with honey, then thrust it into the bees. They all fly and settle onto it. After they have settled on it, we shake them into the hive. We blow some of the dawwe onto them and put them there.

(12) The bees start to work. The next day we place it (the hive) next to the others. This is how you keep bees. In winter we close their (the hives') mouth, so that they do not die of cold. We put them inside and let them out in summer.

(13) Every swarm that flies out they put in a new hive. You put one hive here—they are round like this—you put it here and another one on top of it, and another one on top of it. If you want to make a swarm fly out, you put smoke on this side and the bees will go aside, then you take the honeycomb and so forth from behind.

Easter

(1) I shall tell you what I remember when I was young in the village of 'ɛn-Nune, what we did for the great festival (Easter) and the small festival (Christmas). Until now these things remain in my mind and are not forgotten.

   (2) At three o'clock in the morning our parents used to wake us, dress us in the new clothes that we had and we would go down to the church, the church of Saint Sawa in 'ɛn-Nune. We would begin the mass at half past three. (Since) we were young—we would enter the church, the door of the church was very low, (like) all the churches that were there in Barwar—we entered and if we were young, they would put us first (at the front). (3) We used to listen and see the priests performing the mass. We would wait for the mass to finish so that we could go outside, so that afterwards we could take red eggs and knock them together and see whose one would break. We would have great fun when one of us beat somebody else's egg. (4) After that, we all gathered together with our parents and would go up to the house. They would have prepared tea, and kade cakes to eat, together with yoghurt and the crust of yoghurt, (a local product) of those villages. We would sit eating breakfast together. Then we would knock red eggs together and have fun. (5) After that, when the sun rose, all of us friends would go outside and play. We would mostly play (the game) of red eggs. There were many ways to play. They would knock them together or we would put them in shoes—we would find three or four shoes, two of them would be empty and the red eggs would be in the others. (6) When they drew out one of these, one turned out to be empty, without eggs in it. We friends would go out and play together various games. People would go and make festival visits to each other. We really enjoyed ourselves.

   (7) Something I remember well until now—people would come, not two or three together, but we would see ten, fifteen people, all of whom had come together to offer the festival blessings. Then, in the same way, they would go out of one house and enter another house. (8) We would spend the first day of the festival offering festival blessings to one another, waiting for people to come and offer us festival blessings and we would go to offer festival blessings to (other) people. Such a thing is unforgettable.

(9) This year, when I went to the land, 'ɛn-Nune—but I did not spend the festival in 'ɛn-Nune, I spent it in Dohok—again we saw our relatives, we knocked red eggs together at half past four in the morning. Then we went and ate breakfast. It was similar to the life that we lived in the villages, but it was not (exactly) like it. Nor was it like that of other towns, such as Baghdad or the towns of the West, where we now live.

(10) We were young and were afraid of our teachers. When we went to a wedding and we saw our teachers sitting with our parents, with our fathers, we did not dare approach them. Why? Because we felt great respect for them and we feared them. It was not like today, we see school children for whom it is meaningless whether their teacher is present or not. We would go and hide when we saw the teacher. (11) On the other hand, we enjoyed ourselves a lot, on account of the food that they made at the weddings and the sound of the drum and pipe, which was very beautiful when they played them. Everybody gathered together at a wedding, enjoying themselves and dancing. (12) When they had made xumṣa and numerous foods, the people sat down at lunch time or at dinner time and ate their dinner, everybody together. The people were very happy. Our life in the villages was very simple.

Christmas

(13) In truth, Christmas—I do not remember much about what we did. I remember, however, that also at Christmas we would go to mass, also in the church of Saint Sawa. Afterwards we would celebrate it and, when we went out (of the church), we would offer festival blessings to each other. (14) Also at that time we would go and offer festival blessings to people in their houses and people would come and offer festival blessings to us. It was a truly a pleasant custom, since all our relatives were there. Although the life was simple, people were very happy. There was joy, since the people gathered together. There were many people in the village. (15) When there are many people, of course a person feels in himself more that…we thought that this was our world, that is, there was not another place that was more beautiful, where we were happy like we were there in the villages.

Houses

(16) The houses—in fact, all, we can say that they were mostly built on stones, houses that were on stones. They built their houses in the village always on stones. Even those that were not in the village, which they built outside the village, where they saw a place that was solid, they would build their house on stones, so that the house would be stronger. (17) Like Christ himself, who says: Build your church on stone. It would then be stronger and waves of water would not wash it away. On the other hand, all the houses, all our houses that were in the village of 'Ɛn-Nune, consisted of one floor. (18) Some of them, however, had basement stables, as we called them, basement stables. Domestic animals, sheep, oxen would go into the basement. The basement was below, that is the lower floor was the basement. There the domestic animals would live. (19) Then, secondly, the wood that they cut down for the winter, for the people to kindle, would make a fire and warm (the house). People would store these and put them in the basement to dry, so that they would not be in the rain. (20) The houses consisted of two or three rooms, each house (was like this). The smallest house was two rooms. Yet there were houses, I remember, in our village, the house of my uncle Isxarya Dani, who was the chief of Barwar, his house consisted of two floors. That he had four or five rooms. (21) Of course his house was always full of guests. Guests would come come and stay. They would lodge in his house. They would eat and drink. Some of them whose homes were far away would stay there and lodge. They would stay and sleep for a night. The next day they would get up and go on their way, to their homes. (22) Indeed, the houses were all made of stone, mostly dressed stone and gypsum. Their houses were plastered inside. They called it plastering. They would plaster the wall so that it would be straight. (23) Up to that time in winter there were stoves. They used a stove. Also this year I saw a stove. I had not seen a stove for fifteen years. A stove is for heating in winter, which, of course went up and came out from the top of the house. You put wood in it and the wood blazes up. (24) The room in which there is a stove becomes warm, you would say more so than (is the case with) the central heating that is here in London. It is amazing. When they put three or four pieces of wood on the stove in the space of a minute the wood would kindle. (25) It has a small window, the more you opened it, the more air entered it. You would see the wood kindle. As soon as the wood has kindled, you must close this small window of the stove, so that it does not heat too much. For if it heats too much, you can no longer sit three metres from the stove. You cannot sit, since it is so hot.

(26) In winter, indeed, all our villages used this stove, since it was very cold. Every room had a stove in it. Since a room that did not have a stove in it would become icy before the morning and nobody would be able to sleep in it.

(27) In summer, in fact, in our village of 'Ɛn-Nune, in Barwar, summer is not very hot. We slept mostly in the houses, in the house itself. This was because even in July and August, after nine o'clock at night, it started to get rather cold. It is not like in other towns, like in the towns of Dohok or Zakho, which are quite hot and people must sleep on the roof. (28) But there again, there are days when it is hot and people would go up onto the roof and sleep. There was a mosquito net, as we called it, which they put on themselves so that mosquitoes[1] would not come and bite them. (29) In most cases, however, people were in the houses, for perhaps only in July and August there were some days when it was rather hot, that is at night, and people would take out and take up their beds and bedding, take them up onto the roof and sleep on the roof. But they had to put up a mosquito net so that mosquitoes[2] did not come and bite them.

Swimming in Pools

GK: Did you play games?

(30) There were many games, but I do not remember them well, since I left there when I was seven or six years old. There is, however, one thing that I remember very well, a game that I liked was that of swimming. (31) (When we went) swimming there, there was not a swimming pool like here, there was a pool in the river. The river flowed down into 'Ɛn-Nune. They would make pools. Then the water would rise to around two metres. We were young and we used to go to swim in those pools. (32) I'll tell you, when I was six years old, a cousin of mine and his brothers, who were around ten or twelve years old, older than me, did not allow me to swim with them in their pool. They said 'This is for the older (children). You are young. Go and swim in the pool for young children'. (33) Once they were throwing a coin. They turned their eyes to the mountain and their backs to the pool. They threw a coin then went down into the pool to find where the coin was. Whoever picked it up won (the game). Since I was young, they did not allow me to play with them and swim with them.

(34) I looked and saw where that coin fell. They all threw themselves in the pool and went down (to look). They went up and down, up and down. Nobody saw it. Then, when they had gone down, I also threw myself into the water and went down. (35) I found where the coin was and took it in my hand. I held it in my hand together with the soil, the soil that was there. I swam, came up and stood up. However much they swam (trying) to find the coin, they could not find it. One of them said 'That's enough. Let's throw another coin. It is lost. We cannot find it anymore'. (36) I said to my cousin 'It is here in my hand'. He said 'Open your hand for me to see'. I opened my hand. The soil and the coin were in my hand. He said 'Where did you find it?' I said 'I swam down, I knew where it was'. I picked it up and took it out'. From that day they said 'From now on, since you are (as good as) that, you also may swim with us'. They allowed also me to swim with them.

Attacks by Wolves

(37) There is, in fact, a story that I do not remember, but my sisters tell me it. We had a small dog. My father—may he rest in peace—was not there. Only my sisters and my mother. I was young. At that time in winter wolves would come from the mountains. They would come near to the village, since there was snow and they did not have food. They came near to the village in order to find food to eat more easily. (38) They say that the snow had almost reached twice the height of a man.[3] The snow came and almost reached the roof of the house. Then, they say that the dog went up onto the roof. Then a wolf came from behind the house and went up and sprang on the dog to take it away. (39) Then my sister tells me—Jenny, the older one—she says 'Brother, the dog took my breath away'. She said 'I wanted to cry out, but could not do so anymore'. This is because there is something they believed in, namely that a wolf took away the voice of a person and the person could utter his voice. (40) She said 'I tried to cry out, I wanted to cry so that the wolf would go, or so that people would come to help me, but I could not. I (tried to) cry to myself, but no voice came out'. She said '(The wolf) took (the dog) and went a hundred metres away and then my voice came out, but then what was the use?' That is, he had taken the dog and gone and eaten it.

(41) She said 'We sat for a week weeping for it, since nobody could come to answer our cry for help or save our dog from the clutches of the wolves. Nobody came, that is (nobody) responded to those cries for help, and (the wolf) took it and ate it'. (42) She says that she will never forget this in her life. It remained in her memory. Poor soul, until now she cannot forget that thing. This is how she told it to us.

(43) Every village had domestic animals, cattle and domestic animals. They would send them out in the daytime. There was a cattle minder who would go and pasture them in the mountains. Then in the evening, around six o'clock, in the evening, the cattle minder would gather the cattle and bring them back. (44) You would see the cattle when they came back, all walking along together and each one knew where its house was. Each animal arrived at the basement stable of its house and went into its house. Only a few of them remained without arriving at their house. Their owners, of course, would be waiting and they went to fetch them and put them (in the stable). (45) But once—I remember something else—all the village had, as I said, a cattle minder who went out from morning until evening. At that time each village also had two or three dogs that went out with the cattle. One day one of these came back drenched in blood. (46) What did the cattle minder say? He said 'Today three wolves ganged up together against it in order to take a lamb from among the animals'. He said 'It killed two of them. It drenched the other one in blood and the wolf fled. It (the dog) also became drenched in blood'. (47) I remember until today that the people of the village came and said 'Tomorrow do not send it. It must stay here in the basement stable, it is not right (to send it), since it has been drenched in their (the wolves') blood'. (48) Indeed these (dogs) were guards, as you say, of the animals, for what could a shepherd do? If a wolf came, what could a shepherd do? On many occasions the shepherd went out without taking a gun with him. He went out with a wooden stick in his hand. The ones who protected the cattle and sheep were the dogs, which were in charge of the animals and went along with them. (49) I remember until today that it was drenched in blood. People came and said 'What has happened?' They said '(There were) three wolves, it killed two and drenched the other in blood and it (the wolf) ran away from it'. I remember this until now, since we children went out to meet it.

The Fruit of the Village

(50) In the summer months, let's say September, in the apple orchards you would see the apples all red and fallen on the ground. People did not eat those that fell on the ground. They gave these to the animals. They gathered them in a sack and put them in the basement stable, so that they could take from them and give them to the cows and animals for them to eat. (51) It was sad that there was no wood factory in those days, in order for them to be able to make boxes to put apples in, to take down to the towns and sell. So, they sold them (while still) on the land. (52) A purchaser would come and say 'I shall give you such-and-such for them'. The owner of the land would say 'I am content (with that)' and would sell them to him in this way. They were not (measured) in kilos. He calculated how much they were worth and said 'I shall give you such-and-such'. He would satisfy the owner and take them from him. (53) I remember until now the plums that we used to eat, the wild plums that they used to eat, the peaches, the apricots, the grapes. The orchards were abundant (with fruit). There were black grapes and white grapes. (54) I shall tell you a story (about something) that happened. Once we went up from Baghdad to ʾƐn-Nune. I brought up two friends from Baghdad, who were not Barwar people. They were our brothers, one of whom was from Urmi, an Iranian Assyrian, and the other was a man from Diyana. They, however, were living in Baghdad, they were born in Baghdad, they were living in Baghdad. (55) We went up to ʾƐn-Nune. (One of them) saw the peaches, the large yellow peaches, hanging on the tree. He took a peach and bit into it, one bite, two bites, three bites. He said the other is more tasty. He took the other one and threw that one away. (56) This was because there you could eat as much as you like, it was free. Nobody would say 'Why are you eating them?' But a person did not bring a box and take them away. He could eat as much as he could eat (on the spot). He ate five peaches.

Food and Drink

(57) That night we sat with my uncle and his family, in his house—he invited us, he said 'Come to us'. He said 'Today I shall give you our drink to drink, which I have made. He brought out whiskey, (which was made) from apples, very old whiskey, the alcohol in it was perhaps not forty-five but as much as eighty-five (percent).

(58) We sat there and he poured out a measure. He said 'For my friend'. He was very tall, that is he was more than six feet tall and very strong. He said 'Cheers' and drank. (He says) 'Cheers' and drinks. (While) my friend, who was a huge man, had not yet finished his measure (of whiskey), we saw him go inside. (59) He went away. His name was Daniel. I said 'Daniel, what is the matter with you?' He said 'I felt dizzy'. I said 'You usually drink a bottle of whiskey. How is it that you have become dizzy with this measure? He said 'By God, I don't think it is whiskey'. He said 'What is it?' He said 'I think it is aeroplane oil'. (60) The degree of its alcohol was so strong that he became dizzy and could not stand on his feet. People enjoyed themselves. They knew how to produce arak. They produced whiskey by themselves. They did not have to go to the market in the towns to bring drink. They produced drink by themselves. When there were weddings they did not have to go and buy drink. (61) They produced it by themselves. They produced a lot. All the people of the villages who came—for when there was a wedding in 'Ɛn-Nune, there were not only people from 'Ɛn-Nune there. They invited all the villages, (people) from all the villages that were adjacent to 'Ɛn-Nune, eight or ten villages. The people were invited. (62) Around two or three thousand people, four thousand people, would turn up, (most of whom were) drinkers, (including) old people. They (all) came to the wedding. They wanted to give them all food and drink. They produced it and put it in pots. Everybody drank, not only one day, since weddings lasted seven days, everybody as much as he could. (63) There were some people, however, who held weddings for three days, three days of drum and pipe, dancing and merriment, eating and drinking. The people enjoyed themselves. Everything was in abundance, food and drink, everything. They would make food. The women of the village would come and they would cook, (the women) who were relatives of the person holding the wedding. (64) They would cook in small pans and large pans. They would put in the large pans the food that they were cooking. It was xumṣa or duxwa. They cooked every (type) of food. At that time drink was abundant. Everybody would drink and eat for two or three days. They were merry and jolly.

Weddings

(65) What was our custom at a wedding? I shall give you a description about also this. It was a most pleasant thing when they brought the bride out of the house of her father. They called this čappe buke. They would bring the bride out and put her on the back of a mule, since in the old days there were not many horses.

(66) They would put her on the back of a mule and they would go and take her around the village, until they brought her to the house of her husband. When they reached there, there was a tree. As we say today (wedding) cake, there is a cake in the ceremony, at a wedding, at a marriage, today. In the old days there was no cake, but there was a tree. (67) On the tree apples were placed, or walnuts, or money. They would decorate all the tree. They would go up on a high house and sell the tree. The money that was received from the sale of the tree was assistance for the bride and groom who were getting married. (68) They would say, for example, the maternal uncle of the groom has bought the tree for fifty dinars. The maternal uncle of the groom has bought it for a hundred dinars. Another has bought it for ten dinars. Until all those who were buying had finished. They were not really buying it, but they were sharing in (giving) asssistance to the bride and groom. (69) When they finished, they shook the tree. They shook it from on top of the roof. All the things that were on it came down. Then you would see small children running after those things, whether they were chocolates, apples, money. Each one ran to gather for himself. Also the older people would gather them. I remember that until today. The shaking of the tree—they would do this on the day of the wedding. (70) The next day, they would say 'Let us tax the people who were present at the wedding'. The bride and the groom would sit and they would put out apples, chocolates, various things, on a tray that was placed on their table. Then the people who were sitting there—there were two ushers and these two would come and take (these things), for example, and bring something for each person who was present. Each would take something and they would tax him. (71) Who taxed him? The best man, who was present there, the best man of the groom. He says 'You must put five dinars here, since you took an apple from this plate of the king and queen'. This is because the bride and groom were the king and queen. He had to deposit five dinars there. Then he took took his apple and went away. (72) This custom—there were two aspects to it. Firstly, socially people enjoyed themselves and spent (a happy) time at this (event). Secondly it was a joint effort to assist the bride and groom with the expenses that they had disbursed so that they could get back something for themselves. (73) Indeed I remember also these things. I recall them (from the time when) I was young and also when we grew up. Many weddings took place in the village. We would go up (to the village) and see them. We indeed kept them (in the customary way).

(74) What were the wedding songs? In the old days it was not like now, when there is a music with a band and so forth. On the day of the washing of the groom there were lɛliyane. They went and took him to a channel or a wash house, wherever it was. There, after they washed the groom, during the washing and after they washed, at the time of the washing of the groom, they began to sing in two groups, until it was finished, and again until they brought him to the house of the groom. This was a lɛliyana. (75) On the other hand there were songs (known) as rawe. There were not songs like now, when there is a singer who sings a song accompanied by music. No. It was a rawe. The Christians, let's say the men, by themselves, would sit in a reception room and sing rawe. You would see one person on this side (singing) and another on the other side answering him. Those songs were like that.

Dancing

(76) When people danced, they did not dance to the songs, but to the sound of the drum and pipe, the music of the drum and pipe. When the drum and pipe played in 'ɛn-Nune, the people of Dure would hear and would come. They said 'They have begun to play, let's go'. (77) Or (if there was) a wedding in Dɛrəške, we in 'ɛn-Nune would hear the noise and say 'We think they have started now. For, sometimes, they played for eight hours continuously without stopping. They would play for eight hours and the people held (each other). (78) At that time there was no 'stage'. There were places in our village of 'ɛn-Nune, there were threshing floors. These were threshing floors where they brought agricultural produce, wheat and such like, which they made there. The people would dance on those threshing floors. (79) This was because they had made the ground level and the people could form three or four rows at once. The people formed four or five rows when dancing. Of course, men and women all together. They were dressed up festively in Assyrian clothes. (80) Let me tell you something that happened once. A woman was jealous of somebody who was at the head of the xəgga dance, he was at the head of the dance and dancing, shaking very energetically. She was an old woman. (81) She said 'Who is that who is shaking himself like that. He knows nothing (about dancing). What kind of dance is he dancing?' Somebody said to her 'Don't you know who that is?' She said 'No'. He said 'He is the son of your sister'. She said 'Yes, he is like a bishop among priests. Doesn't he dance well!'

The Gayasa

(82) The second day of Easter is (the ceremony of) the gayasa. I remember until today that we were young and we went and stood at the front, for when young children stood in the church, it was a rule of our church that they would make us stand at the front. (83) We would stand at the front and I remember father Šəmo—(he is) the priest whom I remember—he would tap the gayasa (on our heads). There was tied to a long stick, about two metres, two metres and a half in length, there was tied—they were wicks, they were tied to it, with the top of the wick upwards. (84) Father Šəmo would come and a deacon would help him. He would tap it on each of our heads. As far as I remember—we were young—he would tap it once, then we would put our heads like this, so that he would tap again, since we were young and we did not, in truth, understand what the meaning of it was. But I remember until now that we would have ourselves tapped (on the head) two or three times. (85) Another thing—when we came out of the church, in the courtyard of the church there were women distributing bread. I shall tell you also about this, since this also happened to me. (86) I was young, I was about five years old. I went out.
We were supposed to go from right to left (along the line of women) to take bread, then finish. We finished with the last woman, then went out.
I went together with my friends. We stood and took bread, then went and came back. [interruption] (87) We went into the courtyard of the church. It was a memorial. Everybody had donated something to Saint Sawa. They would bring bread or meat, or whatever there was, cake filling, and the one who has donated calls the people so that everybody takes and then goes off. (88) I remember until today that I and my friend came and went round and filled our hands with bread and things, then again. Every woman I went to—I did not know what it was all about—(said) 'Hello my dear, welcome'. She held me and kissed me, then gave me some of the bread or the meat or the cake filling. (89) My arms were full. When my arms were full, I went and delivered the things to my elder sister and she distributed them, together with my late mother. I deposited them there and again went off. I went round three times. I should have gone only once. (90) In the end my sister said 'What are you doing? How many times have you gone round and taken this?' I said 'I (have been round) three times so far'. She said 'That's enough. It's shameful. Don't give us a bad name! Come and sit here'.

She distributed everything again to the people, for there were many people and it was a memorial service. I remember this until today.

Memorials

(92) When do we hold the memorial? The thirteenth of September was the Festival of the Cross. The thirteenth of September. For hundreds of years they observed the memorial of Saint Sawa, which took place on the thirteenth of September. Until today, every year, on the thirteenth of September, they observe the memorial and the Festival of the Cross. They slaughter sheep and perform a sacrifice for that day. (93) Today there are not many people (in the village), but on the day of the Festival of the Cross, the thirteenth of September last year, about two thousand five hundred people were present that day. We took holy communion, as they say, then went out and celebrated the day. If you want (to see) a photograph, we have a video film.

The Festival of 'The Bride of the Ascension'

(1) The Bride of the Ascension[1]—first we would go down to the church. The priest would tell us everything, how you should make the 'bride', adorn her, and go from house to house. We would go back up. After we finished taking communion,[2] we would go back up to our home. (2) Then we would make a young girl the bride of the Ascension. We would make her the bride. We would put on her all kinds of things, as if she were a bride. We would take a girl with us from house to house. (3) Anybody who had money would give (it to her). Anybody who had sweets, would give (them to her), whatever he had, eggs, those red eggs, he would give to her. (4) When we finished with this,[3] we would hang a rope onto a tree, a mulberry tree, and we would swing on it, all of us, from small children to older ones. We would all go and sit and have fun there. We would make food to eat and we drank. Then we returned home.

Easter

(5) On the day of the 'Great Festival' (Easter), we would paint eggs. We young people would go and play in the streets. We would play in the streets. We would put eggs in a shoe. We would put eggs in this shoe of ours. We would play and see who won. We would win them and place them aside. Everybody won two or three. (6) The boys would take them and knock the eggs together. We would sit and have fun. We had a party. They all danced and sang. They did everything. We knew no sadness, we had nothing (to sadden us) at that time. In our own land we were very happy and cheerful. When we grew up, we left the land.

[1] This festival has been combined with the festival of Ascension 40 days after Easter. It is a memorial for an event that took place in 13th century during the Mongol invasions. When the kingdom of the Assyrian king Šaliṭa was under siege, food for the defending troops was was collected and conveyed to them by young girls.

[2] Literally: We would take communion, we would finish.

Ṣawməkka

(7) When the beginning of the (Lent) fast came, we would take all our vessels, we would take them all and put ash on them to clean them. The ash was instead of (the detergent) 'Tide', instead of such things, which not everybody had. They would wash with ash, wood ash. (8) We would burn wood, it became ash and we would wash vessels with it. We put it in water and it became slippery like this, and we would wash vessels in it and so forth, until it was the fast. (9) On the day of the beginning of the fast we gathered together, everybody gathered together and made a ṣawməkka. They dressed it with old clothes. They put a thing like this on top of it. Then they would go around with it. (10) The ṣawməkka was a poor man. We made for him ragged clothes. All his clothes were ragged. We would cover his face and left a little (space for him to look out) like this. Then we made him dance. They made him dance so that people would give him raisins, walnuts. We would boil things. Everybody would give (something) and put it in the vessel. They would take (these things) home to eat them. (11) They took him from house to house, they made him dance. They sang to him, from house, to house, to house, to house, until in the evening we finished. After we finished, everybody went to their house. We fasted, we did not eat anything, from small (children) to older people. (12) We all ate vegetarian things, we did not eat anything with either meat or fat, not eggs, nothing, for fifty days. Until now this has remained in our memory. (People said) If we do not fast, we shall become ill. We older ones (still fast), but these young children now do not fast.

Miθəkka

(13) When the Minor Festival (Christmas) came, this was similar. We would make a miθəkka. We would cover his face and hide him. We did not sing to him, but rather they hid him and took him to people, like this. When they saw him, they would give him things. All the young children followed each other. They took something and went and sat down to eat it. (14) (This was) the miθəkka—They would fast also (during) this festival, (they would fast) for twenty-five days. Also in this (festival) we would not eat anything, only vegetables and boiled food. Young children and adults. Nobody made food.

The Rogation of the Ninevites

(15) The Rogation of the Ninevites was also observed (in our community). They would fast during it. They would say 'The cocks and the chickens, and also the small lowly creatues (should observe the fast)'. Everybody went and observed it and fasted. For three days, nothing, they did not drink even water, night and day, for three days. (16) All the older people, on the third day, at four o'clock, would take communion. They would put the communion (host) in their mouth. They would eat then go up and for three days they would eat nothing. (17) They would work, go to cultivate (the fields), go to harvest, go and bring things for the house, while they were fasting. We had sheep and oxen. People went to give them food and bring (them back), while they all were fasting.

Girls' Sunday

(18) Before the fast (of Lent) was Girls' Sunday. All the girls went home, took food from here and from there, then went to the mountains, where they sat, ate and drank. The older people, everybody whose daughter was married,—they would invite her and bring her to the house, so that they would eat together. All the family ate together. (19) The other younger people went to the mountains. We made a fire, we brought wood and things. We made a fire and cooked. We cooked rice, we put meat in it. Everybody brought a little meat. We all contributed a little, and it became a big (feast). We set up a big pan and cooked. We ate, then, when we finished, we went home. This is (the festival) of Girls' Sunday.

The Festival of the Cross

(20) The Festival of the Cross. Also on the Festival of the Cross, all the people on the day of the Festival of the Cross would gather together and go up to the church, then came back and cooked and made a memorial. A memorial. We had a smooth mulberry tree. They would cook a memorial (meal), everybody in his own pan, in a vessel, which they would put out, a pan. (21) They would make stew, yoghurt stew. They would put oil in it and syrup. It was called gərðo. Its name is gərðo. They would take it up. We had a large smooth mulberry tree. All the people gathered there. They danced, they sang, they played the drum and pipe.

(22) We had no care about anything in the world.[4] We had no thought to think. Everybody went to work and returned home in the evening. We held the Festival of the Cross. This was one day, we (hold it) on the thirteenth of the month (of September). That day is the Festival of the Cross in our community.

The Gayasa

(23) The gayasa—everybody would go down. They commemorated the names of their dead. The dead people, each had relatives whose name he would commemorate. They would give money. There was a cane of maize, which they made long, from here to that place over there. Pipes, they called it a reed, a reed. It was big. It was very long. (24) They took it and put three or four wicks on it. They tapped it on the head of people, while the priest and the deacon blessed them all. They blessed them all. We would lower our head like this, and they tapped it on our head, so that we would become tall—they put such (an idea) into our heads—so that we would become tall. Everybody stood up straight, so that it would tap on his head, so that we would become tall—our parents taught us in that way. They say:

> Titus[5] called the Messiah
> He put his hope and trust (in Jesus to be saved)
> He has become the friend of our Lord

Then they knock the geyasa stick (on our heads). The priest says this. He says it and knocks (the stick) on our head, so that the door of paradise opens, so that Christians enter. Such things as this that they said have stayed in our minds from then until now.

Cheese

(25) Cheese—they would bring milk, they would bring curds. They would put rennet into it. There was a sour (remainder) of cheese, which they put in it. They put it out in molds. They would make them all, each mould by itself. They would bring milk and (have) a full churn, milk. They would put it in those moulds. They would add some of the rennet, original rennet. They would all turn into cheese moulds.

(26) We would take the cheese. There was a herb that we called hašya and another sərmo. They brought sərmo and hašya from the mountains. We crushed it and put it in the cheese. We called it jajək. We called it jajək. They sold it to people who were rich. They sold it to people and some remained for themselves to eat.

Winter

(27) When winter came, we bought sheep, five head of sheep or so. We would buy sheep and slaughter them. We would make qalya (and put it) in tins for the winter, which we would eat all the winter. We could not do anything on account of the winter. So much snow fell that people could not go out even to here. We sat in the house. (28) We had millet. I made also millet, I and my mother, by threshing it, all by hand, then taking it with a knife. We would scatter it on something like this, we would bring oxen, we would scatter it over it, and they would thresh all of it. They would thresh it and it would become millet. They put it out and cleaned it, then took it home. (It was given) to the hens. They ground it and made it into something—čüče.[6] (29) We had other things that we made, black lentils. We would serve black lentils. We brought black lentils, we cleaned them and brought them home. This was all for the winter. We filled the house. In winter we went and put them out and cooked them. (30) There was something that covered them, which we call the 'husk'. We removed this husk and the lentils become white. We put rice in it and ate it. This also was very tasty.

(1) Now I shall tell you a story that happened in Ṭiyare before the First World War, that is before the year 1914. Our people were in Turkey, in Ṭiyare. A priest, (a man) who had on the clothes of a priest and whose beard was like that of a priest, went up to a village of Christians from Ṭiyare. He arrived in the evening as the sun was setting. (2) He went to a house and greeted a woman who was there cooking. She had a young son. When the woman saw the priest's clothes on him and his beard, she went and kissed his hand, and showed him reverence. She brought a woollen mat and put it on the ground. She brought a pillow (to put) behind his back. She showed him reverence. (3) She said 'Sit down'. He said 'Where is your husband?' She said 'He is working. He will be coming back right now. The priest sat waiting. The young child was shy. He did not go to anybody unless (he was) in the arms of his father. (4) The priest sang him a lullaby, talked to him and laughed with him. He brought the young child and put him on his lap, singing lullabies to him in his arms, talking to him. (5) When the master of the house came back, he saw his son in his arms, while he was singing him lullabies and his son had become at ease with him. He said to his wife 'What is he?' 'He is a priest. Come kiss his hand'. He said 'No. This is not a priest. This is a demon. His beard is full of demons'. (6) He seized the priest and put him into the basement stable. He locked the door after him. He then went off to fetch wood with which to beat the priest. The woman was afraid and was ashamed. She called the neighbours. She went and told the head of the village and they came. (7) They said 'Why are you beating the priest?' He said 'He is not a priest. It is a lie. All of this beard of his is full of demons. He is not a priest'. In the end they said that he (the householder) was mad. They rescued the priest and took him to the house of the village head. (8) There they showed him reverence and he ate. The next day he fled. He went from the village and went to we know not where. They said this Namudko (the householder) is mad. That is why he was behaving in this way.

  (9) A year went by, two, three. The First (World) War began. When the war began, also the people of Ṭiyare fled and went to Urmi. They went to Urmi and in the year (19)17, the war stopped, it finished. The English entered Iran and came to our community. (10) They found that our community was very needy. They gave them supplies, bread, loaves, they gave them tea, supplies. At that time the people were standing (waiting their) turn, one after another, coming to take their supplies and going away.

(11) Some English officers were standing there, doing administration, that is they were saying 'Distribute it!'. The man whose guest the priest had been approached. His name was Namudko. His turn came to take (supplies). (12) An English officer who had two stars[1] saw him and recognized him. He said 'You—Don't give to this man, don't give to him! You stand over there in last place. All the others will finish before you'.[2] He was afraid. He said 'What have I done? Where does he know me from, that officer who says to me not to take provisions and stand in last place?' (13) He thought about it to himself.[3] He went to stand alone far away. He kept looking at that English officer. He was afraid. He said 'What is it all about?' After all the people had finished taking provisions, the Englishman called Namudko, he said 'Come, also you take. Come here'. (14) He said 'Don't you know me?' He said 'No. I don't know you'. He said 'Look at me well. Have you never seen me?' He said 'No. I don't know you. But I have heard that voice of yours, but I don't know when.' He said 'Do you know who I am?' He said 'No'. (15) He said 'I am that priest who came to Ṭiyare, whom you seized and confined in the basement stable. You beat me and said 'He is a demon, not a priest'. Your wife started screaming at you and called people, who came and rescued me from your hands'. (16) He said 'I am that priest. You were right. I was a demon. I was a spy then, an English spy. Look you can see these stars on my shoulder. I was a spy who came there. If ten other men from Ṭiyare were as intelligent as you, you would not have reached this miserable condition,[4] you would not be sitting here and have become so poor.

(1) There is a village in Barwar call Čallək, where there is a church called Mar Muše. There were Kurdish nomads, who went down to the plain to be warm in Winter, when it was cold in the mountains. When it was Summer and Spring, they would bring their sheep up to the summer pastures in the mountains, which are called zawzane. (2) So, they would come alongside that village and become guests of the village. They would take their sheep onto the roof of the church. This was because the roof of the church at its back extended to the mountain, so high was the mountain. The roof of the church was like that. They would come and go down (the mountain),—a person could easily go onto the roof—bring their sheep and take them onto the roof. (3) The people of the village tried (remonstrating with them saying) 'Don't take your sheep up onto the roof of the church. It is a sin'. They were Kurds. They were tough. The people of the village were afraid of them. They said 'We don't want them here'.[1] (4) Now, the people of the village sat in a house at night, gathered together, and one said 'Saint Muše needs help, he needs help. If we do not help him, the Kurds will do this every day'. They said 'How will we help him, help Saint Muše?' He said 'Leave that to me'.[2]

(5) He went and brought some skins and tied them on himself. The man made himself like a bear. It was night and it was dark. He slowly went up from behind the church. He came onto the roof among the sheep and went along shouting, behaving just like a bear. (6) The sheep were startled and were afraid. They ran and went down over the eaves of the church, the front of which was high. Half of the sheep threw themselves there. They all broke their necks and died. They died, while he fled, went down and hid himself. (7) In the morning the people got up, the owners (of the sheep) saw that they had all fallen and broken their necks. They called to the people 'What is this?' They said 'Didn't we tell you? Saint Muše is strong. He will strike you. It is a sin. Don't take them onto the roof. Take them far away from the roof of the church. Why do you bring them on the roof of the church? St. Muše has brought this upon you'.

(8) They were afraid and gave a gift to the church of two head of sheep. From then on, when they came down to the plain returning from the summer pastures, they would give two head of sheep. They would dwell (in the plain) and then again go up to the summer pastures and give a gift of two head of sheep to the church, but they would take their sheep far away, since they did not dare come onto the roof of the church.

B19 Rašid Bek

Informant: Dawið 'Adam (Dure)

(1) There was an agha in Barwar whose name was Rašid Bek. He made trouble between the Assyrians and the people of Barzan. When the people of Barzan came to him, he said 'The Assyrians have sworn by your head'.[1] When the people of Barzan came, he said 'The Assyrians want to kill you'. (2) So, they became enemies, although they had not met each other and had not said (to each other) any such a thing. Rašid Bek said 'You, the two sides, should come to me—a hundred men from the people of Barzan and a hundred from the people of Ṭiyare.' (3) Those people of Ṭiyare were Assyrians at that time, who came from Turkey. It was winter and there was snow in the Qumri valley. The Qumri valley is like this, it is a sloping valley. The water flows down it and becomes ice. (4) Those Ṭiyare Christians of ours were wearing sheepskin boots, but the Kurds were not. They reached the top of the valley, called the Qumri valley. Then they made a bet. They said 'Let's see who comes out first.' (They came out), a Kurd then a Christian, a Kurd then a Christian, a Kurd then a Christian, a Kurd then a Christian, (in single file) in order to come down the valley. (5) Our people made a plan. There was somebody whose name was Pətto. Pətto was an elder. He was head of all of them.[2] The leader of all. He said to our Christian people 'When a Kurd goes down first, the one behind him (should stab him) with his dagger'. (6) He said 'When we have finished (coming) over the peak of the mountain, I shall fire a gun and everybody will kill the man in front of him'. He said 'As soon as you know that we have finished (coming over) the mountain, I shall fire a gun and everyone will strike with his dagger and kill the man in front of him'. (7) The Barzan Kurds were slipping, but the Christians were not slipping since they were wearing sheepskin shoes. Each time they slipped, the Christians grabbed them, until when they had finished coming down the valley, Pətto fired his gun, and each one killed the man in front of him. (8) One man ran away. He was bald. He went to Barzan. The Barzan women said 'Where are the other men?' He said 'They have all been killed. Only I have escaped'.

[1] I.e. They have threatened to kill you.
[2] This can be identified as Peter the king of Lizin in Lower Ṭiyare.

(1) My son Sargon used not to sleep. He always cried. We did not know what his illness was. He was a baby in a cradle. We tried (to help him) and took him to the doctors, and so forth, but it was no use to him, they did not know what was the matter with him. (He was) a baby and his ears ached. He shook his head, but we did not know what was the matter with him. (2) What did I do? I composed this song about him. When I sang it, he stopped and listened. When I finished my song, he began to cry. (3) I composed these verses about him and I made for him a tape of it. Whenever he cried, I put on the tape and he listened until it finished, then he cried again. I put it back to the beginning and he listened to it and slept. This is what it did (for him). I used to say:

> (4) Your cradle is white wood.
> The hair of your mother is becoming white.
> She gives you white milk.

(1) This is the song 'My Xošaba'. It was (an event that occurred) in Turkey. An agha, whose name was Usman, came and became the guest of Xošaba from Marga. He had heard concerning him that he had many small cattle. He had a herd of many small cattle. (2) There was (in his possession) a nanny-goat like a shepherd whose name was Nune, a nanny-goat whose name was Nune. She was huge, large like this. There were bells on her neck. She was a leader,[1] like a shepherd. All the small cattle used to follow her. (3) When Usman heard this, he came to the house of Xošaba from Marga and said 'I have come as your guest. I want you to slaughter for me the nanny-goat Nune'. (4) He said 'Why must you do me such an injustice? The nanny-goat Nune is a shepherd for me. All the small cattle follow her lead.[2] If I slaughter her, what shall I do? I shall slaughter for you five head of small cattle, but not her'. (5) He said 'I want only her, the nanny-goat Nune'. He tried to supplicate with him 'Oh agha, (let it) not be so'. Well, the aghas used to wrong the Christians at that time. Xošaba was tolerant, but his son was hot-headed. His son was hot-headed. (6) He started arguing with the agha saying 'Why (do you want) only that nanny-goat Nune? Take another one' Xošaba said to his son 'My dear, be quiet! I shall not let him put the meat of the nanny-goat Nune in his mouth. I shall take out his own liver from his side. Don't be hot-headed. Leave alone. I shall slaughter it'. (7) He went and slaughtered the nanny-goat. He brought it and said 'Here you are, grill it!' He took his gun and went up the mountain. He went up the mountain while Usman sat down and (other) aghas sat with him, they were many Kurds, about forty or fifty, sitting in a gathering with servants attending him. (8) Then Xošaba shot his gun. He (a servant) had grilled the pieces of meat, made them into kebabs and brought them to give to Usman when Xošaba shot his gun—it happened very quickly[3]—and he killed him. Panic broke out. So, at this point, the song goes:

> (9) There was one Xošaba of mine from Marga,
> What a skilled shooter he was!
> He killed Usman the agha.

(1) In Zakho they were building a bridge. We call the bridge the bridge of Dalale. (This was) in the time of the Abbasids. However much they built the bridge in order for its arch to be completed, its arch was not completed, it was not put together. (2) One day, the chief, the agha, saw in his dream that he was rich and powerful. He had seven water mills. He had seven daughters-in-law. He had seven horses. An angel said to him (in the dream) 'You must get rid of one of each of these. You should kill one of your daughters-in-law. You should kill one of your horses. You should stop one of your water-mills'. (3) The angel told him to do these things, so that the bridge would come together and its arch would be completed. Indeed, they had started building the bridge (and had been working on it) for years and years in order for it to come together, but it could not (be completed). (4) He went and stopped a water-mill and killed one of his horses. Now, Dalale—his youngest daughter-in-law was called Dalale—he sent food with Dalale for her to take to the workers who were working on the bridge of Dalale. (5) They said to her 'Any soul that comes onto the bridge of Dalale—that soul will be slaughtered, killed'. She had a dog with her. If the dog had gone first, they would have killed the dog and not killed Dalale. But the dog picked up the scent of carrion. Do you know what a kallәš is? It is a dead sheep. (6) The dog went to the carrion. So, Dalale became the first one. She reached the bridge and they seized her and slaughtered her. They put her on the bridge and the arch of the bridge was completed, it came together. So, they say:

(7) Dalal, Dalal, Dalale,
The high bridge of Zakho
The river under it is blue (with grief).
Dalle (= Dalale) has been seized by her father-in-law.

(8) The narrow bridge of Zakho,
The river under it is narrow.
Dalle (= Dalale) has been seized by her father-in-law.

(9) On account of that dog which was treacherous,
which went down and stood over carrion,
The father-in-law of Dalle wept.

(1) A priest and his wife, a deacon and his daughter—the three leave the church. What is this?

   The daughter of the deacon is the wife of the priest. So, when I said 'the priest and his wife, the deacon and his daughter', the daughter of the deacon is married to the priest. When they come out they are three, but when you name them they are four.

(2) Now, you have an ox and you have neighbours. The grass is situated on the neighbours' (side of) the border and the ox is here in (your) home. To whom does his milk belong? What do you say?

GK: To both of them.
To both of them? You see, you are wrong.
GK: Why am I wrong?
Does an ox have milk? No! A cow has milk.

(3) A cock came and sat down here, outside the house. When it laid an egg, it fell in front of the door of your house. Who will have the egg? Now, the cock is sitting here, in our home, and here it is your home. When the cock laid an egg, where did it fall? It fell here in your home. Who will have the egg, we or you? The cock is ours and the place is yours. This house is yours. When the cock laid an egg, where did it fall? Here in your house. Who will have the egg, we or you?

GK: It is ours.
No! You don't know this one either.
GK: Tell me why.
A cock does not lay eggs. A hen lays eggs.

(4) An egg, do you eat an egg of an ox (tawra)? Do you eat the egg of an ox?

GK: No.
I say that you eat it.
GK: Tell me why.

Don't you break an egg. Don't you break it and put it in a vessel? This is what tawra means. You thought it was an ox.[1] An egg cracks, an egg is cracked and a person eats it.

(5) We kill it in the mountains and its blood flows in the kiln. The answer is: It is wood.

(6) I went to the house of an amir

What bird is this with milk?

(Answer:) a bat

(7) I went to the house of a pasha
and asked a man:
What bird is this with a comb?

(Answer:) The hoopoe bird

(8) It escapes from me and hits you. What is it? A fart? It is not a fart. You think it is a fart. It is not. It is speech. Speech escaped from me and hit you.

[1] The word play here is based on the homophony of tawra 'ox' and tawra 'it (f.) breaks'. The phrase betət tawra could, therefore, mean either 'the egg of an ox' or 'the egg that breaks'.
